Bin Laden warns US

Jolts campaign for presidential poll on Nov. 2

WASHINGTON—Osama bin Laden loomed large over the final whirlwind Saturday of the US presidential race as the two contenders sparred over how best to defeat the al-Qaida leader after he threatened new attacks in a videotape the day before.

Both candidates accused the other of playing politics with the war on terror following the airing by the Al-Jazeera television network of a videotape from the mastermind of the Sept. 11, 2001, strikes on New York and Washington that left some 3,000 people dead.

In the videotape broadcast on Friday, Bin Laden made a direct, formal address to the American people, saying that the best way for Americans to avoid a repeat of the Sept. 11 attacks was to stop threatening Muslims' security.

The videotape of the Qaida leader was the first to surface in more than a year, and it was more formal and less confrontational than the few previous messages attributed to Bin Laden that emerged in the past three years.

Bin Laden did not explicitly threaten any new attacks in an excerpt of the videotape. But the appearance of the tape four days before the US election day injected the presence of al-Qaida and Bin Laden into a presidential campaign in which the threat of terrorism has weighed heavily.

In his statement, Bin Laden referred to both President George W. Bush and Sen. John Kerry by name, but he said the prospect of a future terrorist attack would depend not on the outcome of the election, but on concrete actions taken by the United States.

"Your security is not in the hands of Kerry or Bush or al-Qaida; your security is in your own hands," Bin Laden said. He added: "Any state that does not mess with our security has naturally guaranteed its own security."

At times gesturing emphatically, the Qaida leader wore a long gray beard, traditional white robes, a golden cloak and a turban. He gazed directly into the camera as he delivered his address, which he appeared to be reading from a text.

"Oh, American people, I am speaking to tell you about the ideal way to avoid another Manhattan, about war and its causes and results," he said. He added:

"Despite entering the fourth year after Sept. 11, Bush is still deceiving you and hiding the truth from you, and therefore the reasons are still there to repeat what happened."

In contrast to his haggard appearance in his last videotaped message, broadcast on Sept. 10, 2003, Bin Laden appeared vigorous and healthy.

US intelligence officials, who indicated that they had obtained access to the entire videotape, said it appeared to have been made recently, possibly as recently as Sunday. US intelligence and law enforcement officials said an analysis by the CIA had indicated with "a high degree of confidence" that the tape was authentic.

OSAMA BIN LADEN: The reasons are still there to repeat what happened.

Army hospital chief sacked for using old medicines

By Alcuin Papa

THE COMMANDING officer of the Army's Fort Bonifacio General Hospital has been relieved on allegations that he had allowed expired medicines to be administered to soldiers injured in battle, the Armed Forces said yesterday.

But Lt. Col. Buenaventura Pascual, chief of the AFP public information office, stressed that the use of expired medicines had neither resulted in the death of any soldier nor aggravated the condition of any patient.

Pascual said the relief of Col. William Yu was deemed effective on June 1 but had been approved on July 28 by Lt. Gen. Efren Abu, the then commanding general of the Army and now the AFP chief of staff.

He said Yu was likewise investigated for alleged misappropriation of refunds from the Philippine Health Insurance Corp. (PHIC) and using spurious receipts for medical supplies.

Pascual also said the process was ongoing and that Yu was on "floating status."

But five complainants against Yu have also been relieved, he said.

Yu's relief came to light as a result of an RMN radio broadcast early yesterday of an interview with Press Secretary Ignacio Bunye.

In the interview, Bunye was asked to comment on a nurse's taped statement that she and her colleagues had been told to use expired injectable antibiotics for the treatment of wounded soldiers and even post-surgery patients.

In response, Bunye said: "I believe [Defense] Secretary [Avelino] Cruz should look into this allegation to know if this is true or not."

"He knows how serious these allegations are, and I don't think it is right to just dismiss these outright."

NEITHER creepy nor morbid: David L. Neese, superintendent, Manila American Cemetery and Memorial in Fort Bonifacio, cares for the final resting place of 17,206 US soldiers killed in WWII.

Living inside a cemetery, he fears the living more

By Jerome Aning

GETTING strange looks after mentioning your address is not usual. But then, most people do not live in a cemetery.

Daniel L. Neese, superintendent of the Manila American Cemetery and Memorial, watches over the graves of the American war dead so that their sacrifices would continue to be remembered and honored.

The 51-year-old Neese, a former United States Air Force security policeman and Vietnam War veteran, chuckles when he recalls how new acquaintances would stare at him in disbelief whenever he extended an invitation to his house, which happens to be inside the cemetery.

"Most people don't live in a cemetery but then again it's all up here [in the mind]. Some people buy houses right next door," he said, gesturing to the exclusive gated communities and condominium high-rises surrounding the cemetery at Fort Bonifacio in Makati.

"Just because they're outside the gate it makes a big difference, while I live inside the gate," he said.

Many would regard cemetery caretakers as creepy or morbid creatures, a source of some amusement to Neese who in person is quite the opposite.

"They [caretakers] have that stigma. But I guess the difference is that this place is not just a cemetery but also a memorial. We don't have regular burials here. Everyone here is from the World War II era," he said.

The cemetery, over 61.5 hectares of gently rising ground on McKinley Road in the Fort Bonifacio development in Makati, is the final resting place of 17,206 Americans killed in the Western Pacific during World War II.

Neese heads a staff of one American assistant and 36 Filipinos, some of whom have been working in the cemetery for more than 20 years. Among them are several caretakers who handle the manual job of tending the plots.

LIVING/A21

LIFE IS BEAUTIFUL: A canopy of blue skies and a cityscape of Makati frame the exuberance of a child frolicking through the graveyard at the Libingan ng mga Bayani in Fort Bonifacio. So will the living starting today flock in exuberant numbers to cemeteries all over the country to honor their dead and frolic through the remembered beauty of their lives.

Matatag boys of PMA '71: The ruling class of AFP, PNP

By Frank Cimatu

PDI Northern Luzon Bureau

FORT DEL PILAR, Baguio City—The Philippine Military Academy's Matatag Class of 1971, the "ruling class" of the Armed Forces and Philippine National Police, is hogging the headlines these days.

It's not only because it has such luminaries as Gen. Narciso Abaya, the recently retired AFP chief of staff; PNP Director General Edgar Aglipay, Sen. Panfilo Lacson and Gregorio Honasan, a former senator and ex-rebel leader.

Other mistahs (classmates) are in the news as well, like former AFP comptroller Maj. Gen. Carlos Garcia, for his unexplained wealth, and PNP Director Eduardo Matillano, for keeping a luxury vehicle confiscated from a suspected drug trafficker.

The Matatag boys made up the graduating class the year then 2nd Lt. Victor Corpus—now a retired military intelligence chief—raided the PMA armory in December 1970. (As a consequence, the then PMA superintendent, Brig. Gen. Aurelio Ugalde, was relieved.)

They were starting their military and constabulary service when martial law was declared in 1972.

And as American author Alfred McCoy wrote in his book on PMA Classes 1940 and 1971 ("Closer Than Brothers: Manhood at the Philippine Military Academy," 1999), the "Matatags" were the instruments of the late strongman Ferdinand Marcos in instilling terror among suspected dissidents.

In 1986, the Reform the Armed Forces Movement formed by Honasan and other Matatag members led the defections from the Marcos regime that paved the way for the first Edsa uprising, which drove the dictator into exile.

But it was also RAM that mounted several coup attempts against the succeeding administration of President Corason Aquino.

Even last year's failed mutiny in Makati City had overtones of Class 1971, with the mutineers saying they had been inspired by Honasan's vision and the apparent incorruptibility of Vice Adm. Ruben Domingo, also a mistah.

How did the Matatag become omnipresent in Philippine affairs?

"If you look at the composition of the class, you will see why," the PNP's Aglipay told the INQUIRER.

"It so happens that many of us have the brains. Look how many valedictorians we had," he said in jest.

Oscar Martinez received the Presidential Saber for topping the class. Honasan received the Chief of Staff Saber as cadet first captain, and Matillano, the Baguio Mayor Saber.

But McCoy wrote that in 1997, Martinez was named the principal in the theft of P1.75 billion from the AFP pension fund. A lawyer, he is a retired colonel and now works as a consultant abroad.

RP backs hunt for Pinoy's abductors despite threat

By TJ Burgonio

DESPITE the threat by a splinter Taliban group to kill a Filipino diplomat and two other hostages unless security forces in Afghanistan called off their pursuit, the Philippines is backing a massive manhunt for the kidnappers.

"That's the means of terrorism—abduction. We condemn terrorism and we are in this effort to fight terrorism," Foreign Undersecretary Rafael Seguis told reporters after attending a meeting of the Crisis Management Committee of the Department of Foreign Affairs.

Asked if the government supported the manhunt for the kidnappers, he said: "Of course. We rely on the authorities in Afghanistan."

The three hostages—Angelito Nayan of the Philippines, UK-Irish woman Annette Flanagan and Kosovo woman Ishqipe Hebiba—had helped organize Afghanistan's first direct presidential election on Oct. 9. They were abducted on Thursday.

Afghan forces, backed by for-ign peacekeepers, spread out Friday through a valley west of Kabul to hunt down the abductors, according to news reports from Afghanistan. Helicopters from the Nato-led International Security Assistance Force also helped in the search.

But Akbar Agha of the Taliban splinter group warned: "If the US and Afghan forces find our Mujahideen (holy warriors) during operations, we will kill them."

Iraq-style kidnappings

Members of a group called the Jaish-e-Muslimeen have claimed responsibility for the kidnappings.

The three hostages were part of the UN Assistance Mission to Afghanistan's (Unama's) Joint Electoral Committee which oversaw the elections, won by interim President Hamid Karzai.

The Associated Press, in a report from Kabul, said foreign aid workers had been warned to restrict their movements around the Afghan capital amid fears of Iraq-style threats following the abduction of the three UN election workers.

Police detained seven suspects for questioning over the kidnappings but investigators appeared no closer to establishing whether Taliban-linked militants or criminals were responsible.

After the kidnapping, staff of aid agencies were told to restrict all but essential movements around Kabul—which is patrolled by thousands of Nato peacekeepers, making it usually one of the safest places in the country.

"It's an ominous development," said Paul Barker of the aid group CARE International. "We've not seen this kind of incident in Kabul before and I think we are still trying to figure out if it is a new trend or a one-off. Until it's resolved, we won't really know."

Same commitment

Seguis said Ambassador Lauro Baja, Philippine permanent representative to the UN, had been closely coordinating with UN officials and bodies and had been sending updates to Manila.

The Philippine Embassy in Pakistan, which has diplomatic and consular jurisdiction over Afghanistan, is also keeping in close contact with the authorities and UN officials in Kabul on the progress of the efforts to seek the hostages' release.

Seguis said that while Nayan, 34, a foreign service officer IV, was on official leave from the DFA, the government was devoting the "same commitment" toward his safe release as in the case of Filipino truck Angelo de la Cruz.

Solons say Abaya, officers to blame for AFP's image

By Carlito Pablo

LAWMAKERS yesterday lashed out at newly retired Armed Forces of the Philippines Chief of Staff Gen. Narciso Abaya for blaming politicians and the media for the bad image of the military.

Led by House Majority Leader Rep. Prospero Nograles, the congressmen said Abaya had only himself to blame for his failure to institute significant reforms in the military during his 19-month term at the top, particularly his supposed dilly-dallying on the case of suspended AFP comptroller Maj. Gen. Carlos Garcia.

"Why blame the media and politicians? Does he expect the people to pretend nothing happened? Unfair," an incensed Nograles said in an interview.

He said Abaya should get angry instead at his "own people for damaging the AFP."

"It's the military whose hands got caught in the cookie jar. They are not above the law. It's their responsibility to reform their institution," Nograles said.

Rep. Marcelino Libanan (NPC, Eastern Samar) said Abaya used Congress and the media as "scapegoats for the AFP leadership's failure to punish Garcia and stop corruption in the Armed Forces, which has caused demoralization among the soldiers."

"The buck stops in retired General Abaya's office," said Libanan, a member of the powerful Commission on Appointments.

He recalled that Camp Aguinaldo had been made aware of the Garcia case as early as February 2004, "but it took the military eight months before putting him under house arrest."

"Clearly, there was no firm resolve on General Abaya's part to get to the bottom of the Garcia case and punish all those involved in the corruption scandal," Libanan said.

Rep. Mayo Almarino (Lakas, Davao Oriental) said Abaya should be "humble enough to admit his shortcomings."

"General Abaya still has to explain why the Garcia case was treated lightly or why the AFP failed to implement a recommendation by the Feliciano Commission to reform the procurement system in the Armed Forces to eliminate corruption," he said.

Rep. Roilo Golez (Kampi, Parañaque City) waxed rhetoric in responding to Abaya.

"I shall leave him alone in his moment of reverie as he rides into the sunset of his military career to ponder who is damaging the image of the AFP," said Golez, chair of the House committee on national defense.

"Was it the small group of corrupt generals, past and present, who had methodically and systematically raided the AFP treasury, or those lawmakers who want such shenanigans exposed?" he said.

Last week, Golez said his committee would continue its investigation into graft and corruption in the military despite calls by House leaders to terminate the probe as the cases against Garcia before the different courts had started to move forward.

Senate Minority Leader Aquilino Pimentel Jr. yesterday advised the media to ignore the remarks of Abaya on Friday because "it is the last gasp of a military officer ending his career in a mission of corruption."

Meanwhile, Malacañang yesterday urged critics of Abaya to give the former AFP chief of staff a chance to prove his mettle as head of the Bases Conversion Development Authority, particularly in the eviction of retired generals living on the disputed P12-billion Joint US Military Advisory Group property in Fort Bonifacio. With Michael Lim Ubac and Gil Cabacungan Jr.

Nene to Abu: Sweep up corruption

By Michael Lim Ubac

THE NEW Armed Forces chief of staff should use the "power of the broom" to cleanse the military's backyard of corruption, Senate Minority Leader Aquilino "Nene" Pimentel Jr. said yesterday.

Pimentel said Lt. Gen. Efren Abu's appointment has given him "a golden opportunity to crack down on what appears to be systemic corruption in the AFP."

And he can do this by "using the broom to cleanse the backyard of the AFP," the senator said in an interview.

Pimentel said Abu's first order—the abolition of the J-6 (comptrollership) post formerly held by Maj. Gen. Carlos Garcia—was "at this point purely symbolic."

"Unless General Abu follows through decisively to identify the corrupt officers, whoever they might be," the erosion of people's trust in the military establishment would continue, the senator warned.

Garcia is under investigation by the Ombudsman for alleged unexplained wealth. He is also facing charges before a court-martial for conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman, and conduct prejudicial to military discipline.

Pimentel said it remained to be seen if Abu would be any different from his predecessors. He noted that retired Chief of Staff Gen. Narciso Abaya himself had been expected to reform the AFP when he assumed its helm 19 months ago.

Avoid the rich, powerful, Aglipay tells PNP execs

By Tonette Orejas, PDI Central Luzon Desk and Marlon Ramos, PDI Southern Luzon Bureau

CAMP OLIVAS, Pampanga—Avoid the rich and powerful.

This was the advice of Philippine National Police Director Edgar Aglipay to regional and police directors at last Friday's command conference with Ilocos, Cagayan, Cordillera and Central Luzon PNP officials.

Aglipay also asked the police officials to spend less time in their offices and devote more time to their policemen in the field and their respective communities.

"If you're just in your office or you're often in the company of your governors and rich friends, nothing will happen to the PNP. Let us be with our people," he said.

By that, Aglipay meant "staying out, eating with cops, making them feel you are one of them, joining the patrols, setting examples, being passionate in doing your job."

He cautioned police officials not to pay lip service to the job. "Walk the beat," he said. "That's the only way we can get the respect of our people."

Aglipay also urged his subordinates to be more accessible to the media. "Why? Because that's how it should be. We are transparent. We're hiding nothing," he said.

Taking a dig at the scandal that has rocked the Armed Forces, Aglipay said: "If the media are not allowed to cover us, they might think we're talking here of (fund) conversion."

All these changes, he said, would be for the PNP's "quest to bring back the respect of our citizens."

At Camp Vicente Lim in Laguna, Aglipay exhorted policemen to lead simple lives and avoid controversy in the wake of allegations of graft and corruption in the military.

"As public servants, (police) should live simply. Let us help the government (to) save funds. We should also set as example to the public," he told police officers.

He said he himself has avoided wearing "excessive jewelry" and using police highway patrol units as escorts whenever he travels.

Instead of the officer's uniform, Aglipay said he decided to use the uniform used by ordinary policemen "to show you that I am proud to be a police officer like you."

Aglipay also told reporters that there was no conversion of funds at the PNP saying that every single centavo was being spent as allocated.

But he urged journalists to help the police in documenting alleged corruption in the PNP.

"It is a good thing that you are here and that you ask questions regarding the funds. You see, we have nothing to hide here," he told members of the media.

Finance officers of regional police units presented financial records to show how they had spent the money allocated to their respective offices.

Boracay resort owners urged to use gov't treatment facilities

By Jerome Aning

AS VACATIONERS flocked to Boracay for the long weekend, the Philippine Tourism Authority yesterday asked hotel and resort owners to use the government's fully operational water and sewage treatment plants on the island in order to protect its environment.

In a statement, PTA general manager and chief executive officer Robert Dean Barbers urged establishments on Boracay to avail themselves of the PTA's water and sewage treatment plants in order to save the idyllic island from environmental degradation before it's too late.

The PTA recently completed the Boracay Environmental Infrastructure Project (BEIP) with the objective of improving and expanding the island's water supply and sewage facilities.

Barbers said the water and sewage treatment plants would support and sustain a master development plan that would enhance the viability of Boracay as a world-class tourist destination and, at the same time, maintain its environment and cultural assets.

Barbers said, however, that so far less than half of the commercial establishments on Boracay were connected to the government's centralized treatment plants.

"The irony of it all is that the government is totally supportive of the resort owners on Boracay but most of them ignore this privilege," he said.

Barbers said that based on the BEIP report, only 40 percent of the resort and hotel owners availed themselves of the waste water treatment facilities, while only 25-30 percent were connected to the PTA's potable water supply.

He said the problem with majority of the business establishments on Boracay was that their septic tanks were dangerously close to one another.

"What is more alarming is that their underground water extraction facilities or deep wells, which are located within the proximity of their septic tanks. That practice [could] lead to a disastrous tourism nightmare for Boracay," Barbers said.

Boracay experienced a setback in tourist arrivals in 1997 when it was reported that its source of drinking water had been contaminated by coliform bacteria that exceeded allowable limits.

An investigation was conducted to look for the source of the contamination. It concluded that the inadequate septic and sewage treatment plants on the island were to blame.

Nowadays, the PTA checks up on the hotels' and resorts' potable water supply every other day to assure patrons of safe drinking water.

The Department of Environment and Natural Resources has threatened to cancel environmental compliance certificates and close establishments unless resort owners complied with the DENR directive to put up septic tanks and connect them to the PTA's sewage treatment plant.

Graft raps filed vs Garcia budget officer

By Fe Zamora

THE OMBUDSMAN on Friday filed graft charges against former comptroller budget officer Army Lt. Col. George Rabusa in connection with his unexplained wealth estimated to be P50 million.

An Ombudsman lawyer said Rabusa was not only suspended for six months, forfeiture proceedings were being readied on his assets and properties, which include cash deposits with the Armed Forces and Police Savings and Loans Association (AFP-SLAI) and other banks, houses in Sta. Ana, Paranaque, Batangas and Taguig, and several vehicles under his name, his wife Debbie's and other relatives.

The case against Rabusa was "officially reopened" last Friday based on new evidence gathered, the lawyer who requested anonymity, told the Inquirer.

The filing of new charges against Rabusa coincided with new Armed Forces Chief of Staff Lt. Gen. Efren Abu's campaign to stamp out corruption in the military.

"Graft and corruption have no place in our ranks," Abu said in his address after taking over the post from Gen. Narciso Abaya, who retired Friday upon reaching the age of 56.

"There are new complainants.

In fact, there are two of them. And there is new evidence," the lawyer said.

Initial charges against the colonel were dropped by the Ombudsman in February last year for lack of sufficient evidence after the Rabusa couple produced documents explaining where their assets had come from.

Rabusa was the budget officer of former AFP comptroller Maj. Gen. Carlos Garcia, who also faces a court-martial for charges of unexplained wealth estimated at P200 million.

Garcia was served his charge sheet last the week, and was given until Wednesday to reply. He was also slapped with a six-month suspension starting Sept. 27.

Rabusa was relieved from his post as operations officer of the Central Command in Cebu two weeks ago to give him time to attend the House defense committee hearings on the case of Garcia.

But last Saturday, the AFP leadership placed him under house arrest.

Armed Forces spokesperson Maj. Gen. Edilberto Adan said Rabusa could move around only under guard and with the permission of Camp Aguinaldo commander Brig. Gen. Alexander Aleo.

RABUSA: New complainants, new evidence.

In a press conference during the PMA's 106th anniversary on Oct. 23, Abaya was annoyed when asked about Class 1971 and Major General Garcia, who is facing corruption charges.

"I don't think we should talk about classes," he said. "Classes have nothing to do with it. It's just coincidence."

"Remember that it was a Class '71 [member] who started the investigation against a Class '71 [member]," he said, referring to himself as the former.

In a speech to the cadets, Abaya said idealism in the PMA was not a bad thing.

"On not a few occasions, I have been asked why the PMA trains our cadets in a vacuum. And it has been espoused by some that it is the PMA's ideal environment that should be blamed for deceptively conditioning the minds of the cadets, and subsequently its graduates, that everything exists in black and white," he said, adding:

"It is made to be such in order for you to develop the proper values and work ethic, with the hope that [these] will be carried through when the going gets tough, when the circumstances are not so perfect, and when others exhibit a character of a different mold."

108 members

The Matatag Class numbered 108 at its graduation on March 28, 1971—the first time a PMA class had more than 100 graduates. Marcos, as keynote speaker, called on the class to fight the "communist conspiracy."

Matatag said in its yearbook that it would "forever continue the metaphorical march forward, undelayed and unbowed in its quest of producing the leaders of this nation."

"And as the academy marches on, out of step at times, but still marching on, it will always carry on with its proud heritage, uphold its glorious traditions, maintain its noble standard, and above all, accomplish its mission," it said.

In comparing PMA Classes 1940 and 1971, McCoy wrote that the members of Class 1940 exemplified the selflessness then of the military, which put itself under civilian rule.

He wrote—in the book and in succeeding essays—that members of Class 1971 projected themselves as "heroes," and thus were the antitheses of members of Class 1940, who fought in World War II.

Torture

According to McCoy, President Manuel Quezon viewed the military as important in keeping the young republic safe from invasion, while Marcos politicized it and allowed some of the members of Class 1971 to torture political dissidents.

In a way, wrote McCoy, the interest of the Matatag in torture may have come from the fact that its members were not subjected to hazing when they were plebes.

A CLASS unto themselves, PMA Class '71 at the academy in Baguio, when the world was young and carefree and ideal and everything was either black or white.

Unfair accusation

But Class 1971 historian Rolando Malinis said this was "a serious and unfair accusation" because only four Matatag members may have been involved in the torture of political dissidents.

Another point of interest is that Senator Lacson and General Garcia had had no combat experience, while three of their mistahs died fighting in Mindanao a few years after graduation.

Lacson, also implicated in the Kuratong Baleleng rubout, was the first in the class to become a general.

Personality cult

The class produced at least 43 generals—eight in the Army, 11 in the Air Force, three in the Navy and 21 in the PNP.

The Matatag may now be the "ruling class" of the AFP and PNP but, as McCoy pointed out and with the scandals involving Garcia and Matillano, it has also become the symbol of what ails the military.

Aglipay, however, does not agree with McCoy's thesis that Matatag is ruled by the "cult of personality," particularly that of Honasan and, lately, Lacson.

Aglipay said the past and present controversies involving Matatag members were merely incidental.

"They made their own choices and they are capable of defending themselves," he said.

He also said his mistahs were not fractious but were independent-minded.

"It's the composition of the class that will explain why some of us were involved in national issues then," he said.

Where are they now?

Zosimo Paredes, who served as an assemblyman of Ifugao in the Marcos-era Batasang Pambansa, was the first Matatag member to enter politics.

Marciano Paynor, formerly of the Constabulary, joined the foreign service and is now consul general in Los Angeles.

Nine others are in government service. Many are successful in civilian life, like Iloilo banker Eduardo "Red" Kapunan, a former RAM leader and Honasan's best friend in the PMA, and seven ex-Air Force members who became commercial pilots.

But a source close to a top Matatag member said the mistahs in the PNP—who were not part of the RAM or the coup attempts that brought notoriety to Class 1971—had cliques even during their PMA days.

"They are not closer than brothers," the source said, adding that there were at least three factions in the PNP identified with Matatag.

The difference

McCoy wrote that members of Class 1940, despite becoming war heroes, abstained for the most part from partisan politics and the coup attempts in the 1950s, while members of Class 1971 were "willing" henchmen of Marcos but led the defections that brought down the dictatorship.

He said the corrosive effects of politicization on military socialization and professionalism spelled the difference between Classes 1940 and 1971.

But Malinis insisted: "There is no basic difference between Classes '40 and '71 or any other classes of the academy."

"The character values go with the Cavaliers as they leave the portals of the academy. 'Courage, Integrity and Loyalty,' permeate the minds and souls of the Cavaliers. State leaders and other outside factors may lead them to react in different ways, but still all in consonance with these values."

Bunye also noted that the Department of National Defense was the agency responsible for the military's supplies.

Ongoing due process

The relief and investigation of Yu was carried out on recommendation of the Army's Inspector General, Pascual told reporters.

Quoting information from the Army, Pascual said Yu was relieved and investigated "for gross misconduct in relation to misappropriation of PHIC refunds, allowing the use of spurious ORs [official receipts] and willfully allowing utilization of expired medicine... [and] to determine his suitability and fitness to remain in the active military service."

Yu's case is now with the Army's Efficiency and Separation Board, which investigates allegations against individual Army men and hands down appropriate sanctions.

"These are allegations that are still under investigation. The process is ongoing and due process is being followed," Pascual said.

If found liable, Yu could face dishonorable discharge—meaning he would be separated from the service without his benefits.

5 complainants sanctioned

Pascual said that "for the hospital to function properly," Col. Reynaldo Irena Lipat had been named as Yu's replacement.

According to Pascual, the Inspector General also imposed administrative sanctions on five civilian hospital personnel who had complained against Yu.

The five were relieved of their duties "to pave the way for an impartial investigation while the inquiry is ongoing," he said.

Pascual said the sanctions were imposed because the complainants did not follow the proper procedures.

"Even if the allegations are found to have been valid, [they were meted] administrative sanctions for not following the proper channels. So to make the hospital function continuously while the investigation is ongoing, the five were transferred out of the hospital," Pascual said.

He said the complainants should have gone through the Army hierarchy instead of taking their complaint to the then defense secretary and the then AFP chief of staff.

Prosecute, not persecute

"In its continuing thrust of reforms in weeding its ranks of misfits, the Philippine Army is throwing the book at all its personnel who willfully disregard the rule of law," Pascual said.

"It welcomes any investigation on alleged corruption among its personnel. The Army, however, reminds all concerned bodies 'to prosecute but not to persecute,'" he said. With a report from Gil Cabacungan Jr.

Mekeni Food Corporation

From Selling 'Ice Candy' to Making Meat Products of World-class Quality

Humble beginnings

Mekeni Food Corporation began in 1986 as a home-based chicharon and tocino enterprise of husband and wife Felix M. Garcia and Medicia L. Santos, two public school teachers from Barrio Balubad, Porac, Pampanga. But the business spans over two decades earlier, when the couple, assisted by their five sons - Adrian, Pruds, Lito, Doods and Nards, ventured into backyard poultry and piggery to augment the meager family income. With a loan and some savings on hand, the family started out with 100 chicken heads, a pen, and two piglets. The children, school kids then, also engaged in selling 'ice candy' and chicken eggs within the neighborhood and at the nearby palengke (public market).

Everyone, especially the boys, had a hand in the business - from cleaning the pen, mixing the feeds to gathering the eggs. At daybreak as early as four in the morning, the family would be up doing their chores and the boys would get ready to deliver the eggs to the market right before

During this period, the backyard enterprise started to flourish, becoming a full-blown family business that allowed the Garcias to slaughter pigs regularly during weekends. Years later, the livestock venture expanded into chicharon and tocino making, ushering the birth of Mekeni Meat Products.

Growing up years

The meat business was a great help for Felix and Medicia to send their five boys to college, without which they would not have been able to do so had they relied on their low government salaries alone.

The couple's perseverance, hard work, and commitment to God and family soon paid off, enabling eldest son Adrian to finish an agriculture course, major in animal science, in 1977. He later worked in the United States for a meat processing business.

Pruds and Lito, who both finished accounting, cum laude, turned out to become certified public accountants.

Pruds got a good-paying job as audit manager of Saudi Arabia's largest cement company, while Lito also worked in the Middle East kingdom for three years as cost accountant. Doods and Nards soon earned college degrees for themselves. Both finished business administration, major in accounting and marketing, respectively.

Rising from the ashes of Pinatubo

The 1991 Mt. Pinatubo eruption adversely affected the family business and wrought damage to many homes in Porac, Pampanga, leaving many displaced families to seek temporary shelter in public school buildings. One of these evacuation centers was the elementary school where Felix taught, located in front of his house.

Having pity after seeing the helplessness of the evacuees, he was struck with the burden of giving them jobs or a more sustainable form of livelihood, not just relying on limited government dole out. And so, he summoned his sons, three of whom were abroad at the time enjoying a life of comfort - with stable, high-paying jobs - to get back home and help revive not only their slumped meat business but also rehabilitate their lahar-ravaged community.

"You were born and raised here, schooled in this very town. Why do you have to offer your services to other countries?" goes a poignant letter of Felix to his sons, pleading for compassion for their suffering kabalen (provincemates).

"Tatang's letter was powerful and affected me a lot," Pruds recalled. "It was like cold water splashed on my face at four in the morning. It woke me up! I felt I had a responsibility to fulfill towards my own community."

The first thing the Garcias did when they returned home was to hire 30 qualified people from Balubad to help sustain the meat venture. They made sure each worker was treated like a member of the family, giving them a place and significant role to play in the company.

Dedication, teamwork and drive for excellence were still the underlying principles that govern the processing of their meat products. Wholeheartedly they toiled, striving to earn a fair share of the market, for they knew this was their way of rising from the ashes Mr. Pinatubo brought on them.

Aiming to become world-class

The company would relentlessly study the competition's every move and tried to surpass it. "We would go and buy products from competitors just to see how our products fared. We would conduct taste tests to see if theirs were delicious. And if they tasted good, we made sure ours should taste better," said Adrian Garcia, now MFC's corporate secretary.

Ten years after reviving the business, Mekeni Food Corporation got a shot in the arm when it secured in 2001 a soft-term loan from the Development Bank of the Philippines that could be paid in 10 years and with a grace period of two years. With this financial assistance, the company was able to develop a property in the heart of Balubad, from where it put up its modern meat processing factory.

Today, MFC flourishes with its multi-million peso, job-creating achievements not only for its owners but for the whole community as well. It employs close to 600 workers, 70 percent of whom hail from the barrio.

The company's industrial unit in Porac stands out as a Class "AAA" meat processing plant, one of only few factories north of Manila given such merit. Since it began operation early 2003, the plant has garnered numerous government awards and recognitions for its adherence to food safety, environmental protection, good manufacturing practices, and many other criteria.

From a market confined only to central Luzon, its distribution network has widened, spanning from northern Luzon to Metro Manila and down to Bicol. Recently, it has established a foothold in the Visayas and Mindanao, and soon, the overseas market.

By all standards, the company has already become world-class, a source of pride not only for Pampanga but for the entire nation as well. The feat is attained not in an instant, or by magic, but through the Garcia family's long years of hard work, discipline, determination and adherence to strong family values.

As patriarch Felix, now 77 years old, says: "The success of a business is just a reflection of the kind of family that runs it."

MFC Bags Best Meat Establishment Award

Mekeni Food Corporation (MFC) is a central Luzon-based meat processing firm owned and operated by the Garcia family from Porac, Pampanga. From a small, home-based enterprise almost 20 years ago, it has become a world-class business entity admired not only by the province from where it operates but also by government regulators and its peer in the highly competitive meat processing industry.

Its performance as an outstanding meat establishment is attested by the National Meat Inspection Service (NMIS) of the Department of Agriculture when it awarded MFC last Oct. 22 the distinction of being the Best Meat Processing Plant for 2004 in the "AAA" Category.

Five other finalists had been chosen during the annual competition conducted with the support of the Inter-Agency Committee on Meat Establishment, Amenities and Technology composed of the Department of Health, Department of Environment and Natural Resources, and the Department of Interior and Local Governments. But after a tight screening, Mekeni emerged as the final winner. Mekeni's success did not come because the people who run it employed unconventional management strategies to pursue their objectives. Rather, it is attained and sustained because its owners and managers strongly adhere to business and ethical standards, apply their entrepreneurial skills effectively, dedicate themselves to product and manufacturing excellence, treat their employees as family members, and commit themselves to share their blessings to the community and for God's glory.

A glaring indication of how well the company is run can be seen in the way its meat processing plant in Barrio Balubad, Porac, operates. Inside the fully-air conditioned facility are newly-acquired state-of-the-art equipment and machineries that produce various meat products per day, such as hotdogs, tocino, longanisa, ham and bacon. The production uses the latest technology and maximizes efficiency, allowing the plant to produce best quality foods at very affordable prices.

Here, some 600 office and plant employees do their job under an almost perfect working condition even top companies in Makati and Ortigas Center could only dream of. There's pipe-in music. A modern office complete with board room and conference room and canteen. There are even upscale and well-maintained rest rooms for employees whose description best only those found in first class hotels.

Food safety and observance of good manufacturing practices are strictly enforced in every stage of meat processing. Workers are provided with suitable working attire with color coding to facilitate control of flow from raw to cooked area and to prevent cross-contamination. Entry points to the processing area have foot baths with sanitizers to control entry of microorganisms.

All incoming meat deliveries are inspected to conform to raw material specifications prior to acceptance. Each batch of meat products are checked by quality assurance personnel to comply to finished product standards. All finished goods even pass through metal detection, strict line monitoring, and chemical and microbial checking before they leave the factory.

So stringent are Mekeni's meat handling and processing standards that NMIS had given the company HACCP accreditation. HACCP, or Hazard Analysis Critical Control Point, is a system that identifies, evaluates, and controls biological, chemical and physical hazards that are significant to food safety. In simple terms, getting HACCP accreditation authorizes Mekeni to sell its products both for the local and overseas market, a privilege given only to a handful meat processors in the country today.

"MFC more than qualifies to be a Triple A meat processing plant. If ever there is a higher classification for meat establishments, we at NMIS are willing to place Mekeni in that category," remarked NMIS executive director Efrén C. Nuestro, after conducting an inspection of the plant recently.

PRESIDENT Macapagal-Arroyo recently handed out awards to this year's Ten Outstanding Students of the Philippines at Malacañang's Ceremonial Hall.

The awards were the culmination of the rigorous annual search for the country's 10 top students who had distinguished themselves not only academically but for their leadership qualities, high moral values and deep commitment to community service, undertaken by the RFM Foundation headed by its chair Jose S. Concepcion Jr. and RFM Corp. president and CEO Jose Concepcion III.

This year's awardees were Alexander Edward C. Drilon, cum laude, Medicine, University of the Philippines; Rockwell Gray S. Bennett, cum laude, Physical Therapy, Riverside College, Bacolod City; Mark Lester L. Altoveros, magna cum laude, Physics, University of the Philippines, Los Baños; Charlotte Kendra G. Castillo, summa cum laude, Physics, Ateneo de Manila University; Primitivo Paypon Jr., summa cum laude, Biology, University of St. La Salle-Bacolod; Jennifer L. Digaum, magna cum laude, Electrical Engineering, Mindanao State University, Marawi City;

RFM Foundation chair Jose Concepcion Jr. took the national hero's immortal words to form the seed from which grew the search for The Outstanding Students of the Philippines in 1961.

Other entities that support TOSP are the Commission on Higher Education, the Rotary Club and National Bookstore.

Opposition accepts reconciliation offer

ALMOST SIX months after the bitterly contested elections in May, the opposition has finally agreed to accept the offer of reconciliation extended by President Macapagal-Arroyo.

Malacañang said yesterday the President's offer to reconcile with the opposition had been "positively received" by Sen. Edgardo Angara and the Laban ng Demokratikong Pilipino which campaigned for opposition presidential candidate Fernando Poe Jr.

"We have received reports that Senator Angara gave a positive reception to the President's latest move to offer her hand of unity and reconciliation," said Press Secretary Ignacio Bunye in an interview over RMN radio.

On Wednesday, Ms Arroyo said: "I have invited Sen. Edgardo J. Angara and the party he heads—LDP—to join me in forging a covenant of national unity."

Bunye said Angara would consult his LDP members first before presenting the party's formal response to the President's offer.

But Bunye declined to comment when asked if Malacañang would offer government positions to Angara and other members of the opposition should they agree to accept her reconciliatory hand.

"This is for unity and principle and but we cannot talk of the details because we have to wait for their party's official response," Bunye said.

The President made her peace offer to Angara shortly after designating former Vice President Teofisto Guingona Jr. as special envoy and senior adviser on economic affairs and development through Administrative Order No. 107.

Guingona resigned from the President's Cabinet last year due to differences on foreign policy and supported Poe's candidacy in the May elections. Gil C. Cabacungan Jr.

Passage of 'sin' taxes in the bag, says Palace

By Gil C. Cabacungan Jr.

MALACAÑANG yesterday expressed confidence that the passage of the proposed higher taxes on cigarettes and alcohol products was in the bag although the Senate had barely started deliberations on the revenue measure.

"Our tax reform package is moving forward with the assured passage of the so-called sin taxes," said Press Secretary Ignacio Bunye in a statement.

The House approved on Thursday a bill raising taxes on cigarettes and alcohol by 20 percent in 2005 and three percent annually in 2006 and 2007. But the Senate, which will only start its public hearing on the sin taxes this week, has frowned on the House version as being too low and is pushing for a more drastic hike in taxes on cigarettes and alcohol.

President Macapagal-Arroyo had met with the top executives of Fortune Tobacco Corp. and Philip Morris Philippines Monday night at her Forbes Park residence and managed to get the two dominant players' support for her compromise formula of a 12-percent and 40-centavo hike in taxes next year.

The President's hands-on approach in ensuring the swift passage of the sin tax bill, the first of eight tax measures her administration is lobbying for in Congress, has been praised by some businessmen but jeered by lawmakers who described it as railroading.

But Malacañang seemed unperturbed. "A strong executive-legislative partnership is shaping up behind President Arroyo. This boosts our hopes that the entire tax package will be raised in due time," Bunye said.

Commenting on the House approval, Bunye noted that the market's reaction to the approval of the sin tax bill was "swift and very positive," with the peso gaining ground, the stock market rising to a three-week high, and the country's borrowing rate narrowing to its best level in five months.

"The ball is in the court of the Senate. We are hoping the Senate will act with equal dispatch on this measure," Bunye said. "Early action by the Senate will move us closer to our goal of stabilizing our economy."

The President has decided to take a personal approach in the passage of the sin tax bill to avert a possible credit downgrade that could plunge the country deeper into a fiscal crisis.

The government wants to have at least two of its eight tax measures approved by yearend to retain investor confidence in the President's leadership.

Supply of pork, chicken assured

By Carlito Pablo

DESPITE the difficult times, the government yesterday assured the public there will be an adequate supply of pork, beef and chicken during the Christmas holidays.

The assurance of an abundant supply of these basic food items was made by the Department of Agriculture in a budget hearing last week by the House appropriations committee.

Appropriations panel chair Rep. Rolando Andaya Jr. (LR Camarines Sur) said the DA also assured stable prices for these commodities during the holiday season.

"At least pork, beef and chicken will not disappear like ninangs and ninangs (godfathers and godmothers) hiding from their inaanaks (godchildren) in the weeks leading to Christmas," Andaya said.

"There might be no pork in the barrel but there will be in the pot," he said, referring to the difficulty lawmakers are experiencing in getting their pork barrel allocations due to the fiscal crisis.

Andaya sought a "pork situationer" from Agriculture Secretary Arthur Yap in the course of his committee's hearing of the DA's proposed P14.6-billion budget for 2005.

Responding to Andaya's query whether pork, beef and chicken would be scarce during the holiday season, Yap said: "No, it will not happen. There will be an adequate supply."

THE TEN INSPIRATIONAL ENTREPRENEURIAL STUDENTS AWARDS (TIES): Transforming students from "jobseekers" to "job-makers"

Now on its 2nd year, the Ten Inspirational Entrepreneurial Students (TIES) Awards, a project by the TIES Foundation headed by Ms. Vivienne Tan, is the country's premier award for student entrepreneurs. Unlike other contests, TIES focuses on students who have businesses that are already running and generating profit.

Around 28 students from the country's top colleges and universities successfully passed the rigorous pre-selection process conducted by the Philippine chapter of the Young Entrepreneurs Organization (YEO). According to YEO President Alvin Lao, "The range of the businesses set up by the students competing for TIES 2004 is very much different from the 1st TIES competition. They seem to get better every year."

After the pre-selection stage, these students then showcased their business ventures in the Student Entrepreneur Fair, also organized by the TIES Foundation. The two-day fair entitled "When the Going Gets Tough, the TIES Keeps Going" was held at the new Market! Market! Mall in Fort Bonifacio. It attracted thousands of visitors who wanted to learn and be "inspired" by their fellow students who took up the challenge of running a business venture while simultaneously hurdling the academic demands of school.

The enterprising spirit of the youth embodied in this year's 28 student finalists exhibited ventures ranging from cookies made with virgin coco-oil, soft-serve ice cream, bottled tuyo, specialty coffee, all the way to "magic wallets", TV production and even "haute couture" gowns.

According to Ms. Vivienne Tan, "It is during such times of crisis that an alternative force for change must be highlighted. The youth's entrepreneurial spirit embodied in the TIES participants presents a positive proactive solution to our country's unemployment problem."

Supporters of the TIES Awards project such as Philippine Daily Inquirer Chair Marxi Prieto, Undersecretary Mel Alonzo of the Department of Trade and Industry, and Sen. Francis "Kiko" Pangilinan, fully agree with Ms. Tan's statement, that is why they are also encouraging more colleges and students to participate in the TIES Awards for 2005.

MILF says it's all for peace

COTABATO CITY—Muslim separatist rebels said Saturday they were determined to peacefully resolve their three-decade rebellion in the southern Philippines.

Mohagher Iqbal, chief peace negotiator for the Moro Islamic Liberation Front, said rebel leaders assured members of an international ceasefire monitoring group that they would pursue peace talks with the Philippine government "until a just, comprehensive and honorable peace settlement is achieved."

The pledge was made during a meeting with Malaysian and Bruneian ceasefire monitors at a guerrilla camp.

"Our leaders assured them the MILF is determined to achieve peace in Mindanao," rebel spokesperson Eid Kabali told reporters. "The meeting reinforced the foundation of the peace process in the region."

The ceasefire monitoring team is composed of 10 soldiers from Brunei and 50 from Malaysia.

The monitors will be deployed in the southern cities of Iligan, Davao and Cotabato, and will file reports of any encounters between guerrillas and government troops.

Celso Lobregat, the mayor of Zamboanga City where the monitors were also to be deployed, has refused to host them. He said he feared their presence would cause rebels to enter the bustling port city.

The ceasefire, which has been in effect for more than a year, is crucial to upcoming Malaysian-brokered peace talks. Formal negotiations are expected to resume next month after the end of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan.

The rebels have condemned terrorism, denied any links and offered one of inspection by the military.

THE DAILY GOSPEL

31st Sunday in Ordinary Time

1st Reading: Wis 11:22-12:2
For the entire world lies before you, just enough to tip the scales, a drop of morning dew falling on the ground.

But because you are almighty, you are merciful to all; you overlook sins and give your children time to repent. You love everything that exists and hate nothing that you have made; had you hated anything, you would not have formed it.

How could anything endure if you did not will it? And how could anything last that you had not willed? You have compassion on all because all is yours, O Lord, lover of life.

In fact your immortal spirit is in all. And so by degrees you correct those who sin, you admonish them, reminding them how they have strayed so that turning away from evil they may trust in you, Lord.

2nd Reading: 2 Thes 1:11-2:2

We constantly pray for you; may our God make you worthy of his calling. May he, by his power, fulfill your good purposes and your work prompted by faith. In that way, the name of Jesus our Lord will be glorified through you, and you through him, according to the loving plan of God and of Christ Jesus the Lord.

Do not be easily unsettled. Do not be alarmed by what a prophet says or by any report, or by some letter said to be ours, saying the day of the Lord is at hand.

Gospel: Lk 19:1-10

When Jesus entered Jericho and was going through the city, a man named Zaccheus was there. He was a tax collector and a wealthy man. He wanted to see what Jesus was like, but he was a short man and could not see because of the crowd. So he ran ahead and climbed up a sycamore tree. From there he would be able to see Jesus who had to pass that way. When Jesus came to the place, he looked up and said to him, "Zaccheus, come down quickly for I must stay at your house today." So Zaccheus hurried down and received him joyfully.

All the people who saw it began to grumble and said, "He has gone to the house of a sinner as a guest." But Zaccheus spoke to Jesus. "The half of my goods, Lord, I give to the poor, and if I have cheated anyone, I will pay him back four times as much." Looking at him Jesus said, "Salvation has come to this house today, for he is also a true son of Abraham. The Son of Man has come to seek and to save the lost."

Commentary

To continue the money metaphor from yesterday, Jesus was never impressed by figures and percentages. In the story of the Lost Sheep, the shepherd put 99% of his stock at risk for the sake of 1%. And in the story of the two men who went up to the Temple to pray, the Pharisee had all his figures ready. "I fast twice a week, I give 10% of all I possess." But it got him nowhere. Meanwhile the tax-collector at the back, who should be big into figures, had no such balance-sheet ready, and "he went home at rights with God."

But in today's story we have a tax-collector giving his figures: "I give half of my goods to the poor and if I have cheated anyone I repay him fourfold." He didn't realize how unnecessary it was to quote figures; he mustn't have heard the stories of the Lost Sheep and the Two in the Temple. Jesus just ignored these figures and said, "Today salvation has come to this house" (today, and not when this tax-collector started being "good"). Jesus had already seen him and picked him out. The Son of Man did not come looking for good bargains or sound investments, but for people who were lost.

SUPREME COURT DOCTRINES

CIVIL LAW (PROPERTY)—Donation—A donation as a mode of acquiring ownership results in an effective transfer of title to the property from the donor to the donee. Donation is an act of liberality whereby a person gratuitously disposes of a thing or a right in favor of another who accepts it. Once perfected, a donation is final; its revocation or rescission cannot be effected, absent any legal ground therefor. A donation may in fact comprehend the entire property of the donor. At any rate, the law provides that donors should reserve, in full ownership or in usufruct, sufficient means for their own support and that of all their relatives who, at the time of the acceptance of the donation, are by law entitled to be supported by them. It should be clear that the law protects donors by providing that, without any reservation of sufficient means for themselves, the donation shall be reduced upon the petition of any person affected. "My father wanted me to marry someone else.

But Francis was different. And deep in my heart I knew I would be happy with him no matter what. Denied of all financial support, we decided to marry. Francis was just starting his career as a junior auditor, so we couldn't afford anything. Not a wedding dress. Not a gold ring. We could not even afford flowers... Who would have known that Francis would become so successful and that we would be blessed with a comfortable life? Certainly not me. I didn't see it coming when he slipped on the gold ring and took off the blindfold. There it was right before me, bathed in the glorious morning light... bougainvilleas, pink, orange and white... radiant blue and yellow forget-me-nots, and honeysuckles... Happy twenty-fifth anniversary, my darling, he whispered. Francis remembered.

EU leaders sign historic new charter

ROME—EU leaders Friday signed a historic constitution for the expanding bloc in a fanfare ceremony on the spot where the EU's forerunner was born, although doubts remain over whether it will ever come into force.

The Rome event was also clouded by a row over the EU's incoming executive Commission, which was withdrawn at the last minute this week, leaving the Union in the hands of a caretaker team in Brussels.

The assembled leaders were urged to press ahead speedily with ratifying the constitution, which must pass referenda in at least 10 EU countries over the next two years to enter into force.

"Those decisions we cannot take for granted," said outgoing European Commission chief Romano Prodi.

"The constitution that we are signing today will therefore need to be backed up by a continually renewed commitment on the part of both citizens and governments," added Italy's Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi, hosting the event.

The ceremony took place in the ornate Orazi and Curiazi hall, where the Rome Treaty which established the European Economic Community—the EU's predecessor—was launched by six countries on March 25, 1957.

The Constitution, agreed in June after two years of haggling, aims to streamline EU institutions and prevent decision-making gridlock in a bloc which grew from 15 to 25 members this year, with several more waiting in line.

It notably foresees a longer-term EU presidency to replace the current six-month musical chairs system, while streamlining the executive Commission and creating a new post of EU foreign minister.

Italian President Carlo Azeglio Ciampi hailed the new constitution as "a turning point in the history of humanity."

"The act which you signed today distances us definitely from that chasm of tragic intermedial wars; the specters of the 1930s will no longer haunt the souls of future generations," he said, referring to the rise of Nazi Germany.

But the historic document has still to be ratified by all 25 EU member states to come into force. The trouble is, at least one or two "no" votes are feared in the referenda to be held over the next 48 months.

Analysts say the scale of the political problem will depend on the number of no votes and, inevitably, where they occur. A thumbs-down by Britain for example would fuel talk about sidelining some countries; a negative result in France could lead to a full-blown EU crisis or even implosion.

British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said Friday that Britain was likely to hold its referendum on the EU constitution early in 2006. Blair made no public comment in Rome, leaving shortly after the end of the ceremony. AFP

Arafat tested for leukemia

CLAMART, France—Yasser Arafat was set to undergo a battery of medical tests on Saturday as French doctors investigate whether the ailing Palestinian leader is suffering from leukemia or some other blood disorder.

Palestinian officials said initial tests showed he was in a serious condition but there was no immediate risk of him dying.

Arafat was stretchered into a French military hospital in the Paris suburb of Clamart on Friday, after arriving by helicopter at the end of a grueling six-hour journey from his shell-battered compound in the West Bank city of Ramallah.

The Palestinian president, effectively confined to his offices by Israeli forces for the last 2-1/2 years, only agreed to fly to France after Israel promised to allow him to return to the West Bank following treatment.

Aides said the 75-year-old would undergo several days of tests into his abnormally low count of blood platelets, a condition that can be caused by leukemia.

A senior Palestinian official said on Saturday morning that doctors—who have not yet spoken to the media—had carried out a body and brain scan that showed up nothing and that they would start a series of blood tests on Saturday. Reuters

Boy rescued from Japan quake rubble seeks mother

TOKYO—A 2-year-old boy who was rescued from a crushed car suffers intense fear and asks about his mother who was buried Saturday, a week after a major earthquake struck Japan, doctors said.

Yuta Minagawa, who spent four nights trapped in a white mini-van under the rubble of a landslide before being pulled out Wednesday, seems to have clear memories but remains in intensive care, hospital staff said.

Doctors said the boy, who has come to symbolize the human suffering of the earthquake, is living in fear, refusing to sleep in the dark. He appeared unaware that his mother and 3-year-old sister died with him in the car.

He has been repeatedly asking hospital staff when he can see his mother and inquired Saturday: "Did my mom die in the hospital?"

Officials at Nagaoka Red Cross Hospital would not say whether the news has been broken to him.

When physicians asked Yuta what he drank while he was trapped, he said only, "I drank milk."

"I didn't know what to do because the car broke. Please fix it," the boy was quoted as saying.

Rescuers believe the boy survived by cramping underneath the car in a space 50 cm wide and one-meter high.

Hundreds of mourners gathered Saturday in the town of Koide to pay last respects to the 39-year-old mother Takako Minagawa and her daughter Mayu.

The woman's draped coffin was brought on a hearse to the graveyard past black-clad mourners holding pictures of the girl, whose body remains wedged in the wreck of the car. AFP

Hundreds to be charged over Muslim deaths, says Thai PM

BANGKOK—Hundreds of Muslims will be prosecuted over a demonstration that led to the deaths of 87 people in southern Thailand last week, Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra said Saturday in a move which could further raise tensions in the region.

"I have received a report from General Sirichai Tanyasiri, head of the Southern Provinces Peacekeeping Command, that 300 of the detainees will be prosecuted," Thaksin said in his weekly radio address.

They will face charges including destruction of government property, staging a riot, and robbery, Sirichai said.

Local television showed the first of 900 other detainees being released Saturday afternoon.

Security forces arrested about 1,300 people after the demonstration in Tak Bai, Narathiwat province on Monday.

Of those, 78 were crushed to death or suffocated after being piled into trucks. The government said six were shot dead at the protest and three others were found drowned in a river near the protest site, the foreign ministry said.

Under martial law, suspects can be detained for up to seven days without charge.

Local television showed the first of some 900 detainees, wearing new white and blue T-shirts, being freed and receiving 200 baht ($4.88). Thaksin had said the detainees would receive money and clothing "since their shirts were stripped off during the arrests."

At least two of the freed men removed their T-shirts once they boarded a bus, television pictures showed.

Paced with mounting domestic and international concern over the way security forces handled the incident, Thaksin on Friday night announced an independent inquiry into the deaths.

"I will set up an independent commission headed by Pichet Sunthornpipit, ex-Parliamentary ombudsman, and comprised of legal and Muslim experts and experts on crowds, to investigate the correct and fair information," a sombre-looking Thaksin said in a nationally televised address.

Thaksin did not say when the investigation will begin, or what time frame it has to complete its work.

Thai media, quoting a senator just returned from the south, reported Saturday that the number of protesters shot dead during the demonstration could be far greater than the six reported by the government of the Buddhist-majority kingdom.

Sen. Nirand Pitakwatchara was quoted by The Nation as saying that witnesses alleged security forces loaded three army trucks with 14 or 15 bodies each at the protest site.

Many of the people detained may have been innocent bystanders not involved in the protest, the English-language daily also reported.

During his address, Thaksin expressed "regret" at the demonstrators' deaths. He said he was not prejudiced against Muslims and would compensate the victims while trying to restore stability in the south as soon as possible. AFP

US could rethink Electoral College system

By Mark Sherman

WASHINGTON—It could happen again: One candidate captures the popular vote, but his opponent wins the presidency in the Electoral College.

Such a replay of the 2000 election is an outcome of Tuesday's balloting that many Americans dread. It also could be the one that could finally drive the nation to a serious debate about the future of the Electoral College, the system that actually decides the presidential election in the United States.

Under the Electoral College system, each of the 50 states gets two electoral votes—plus apportioned additional votes based on population. That means winning a state, even by the smallest of margins, entitles a candidate to all of that state's electoral votes—except in two states, Nebraska and Maine, which split their electoral votes, awarding two to the candidate who wins the popular vote across the state and one to the popular-vote winner in each congressional district.

It takes a majority, or 270 of 538 electoral votes, to win the presidency.

In 2000, Vice President Al Gore won a half-million more votes nationwide than President George W. Bush. But Bush nevertheless became president by virtue of getting a majority of electoral votes.

Proponents of changing the way the United States elects its presidents say another mixed result would help build support to change the system, particularly if the parties' roles were reversed.

This year, the possibility exists that Bush could be denied a second term despite winning the popular vote if Democrat John Kerry were to come up with enough narrow wins in battleground states, proponents of change in both parties said.

"That might cause Republican reconsideration just as there was Democratic angst in the last election," said Republican Congressman Jim Leach of Iowa, a longtime supporter of an overhaul of the Electoral College system.

Or, as Rep. Gene Green, a Texas Democrat, said: "That would be like having the shoe on the other foot."

Called outdated and antiquated by its critics, the Electoral College has endured despite four elections in which candidates have become president, despite finishing second in the popular vote.

Most polls find majorities favor getting rid of it. "People think of it as somewhere between bad and stupid," said Harvard University history professor Alexander Keyssar. "But that's been true for 50 years."

Because it is enshrined in the Constitution, the Electoral College could be abolished only through a constitutional amendment, and more than 700 attempts have failed. Amending the nation's basic law requires a two-thirds vote in both houses of Congress and ratification by 38 states—no easy feat, especially because the Electoral College gives small states disproportionate influence. States have a minimum of three electoral votes, no matter their size, as does the District of Columbia.

Defenders of the college say the protection of small states is a good reason to keep it. Do away with the Electoral College, they say, and candidates would campaign exclusively in states with large populations, where vote totals would swamp those of small states.

"The Electoral College embodies two kinds of principles in electing a president: proportionality based on population and equality of states," said John Samples, director of the libertarian Cato Institute's Center for Representative Government.

Proposals to change the process generally fall into these categories:

- Abolish the Electoral College and institute direct election of the president, perhaps requiring the winner to gain 40 percent of the vote to avoid a runoff.

- Keep the college, but have states abandon the winner-take-all formula and allot electoral votes proportionally, as is under consideration in Colorado this year.

- Give the statewide winner two electoral votes and award one vote to the winner of each congressional district, the system used in Maine and Nebraska.

- Give an electoral vote bonus to the winner of the nationwide popular vote, which would eliminate most split decisions.

Leach said the argument against the Electoral College is plain: "We're advocating democracy around the world. Are we suggesting to anyone they have an electoral college?" AP

Japan in confusion over fate of hostage

TOKYO—Japan was thrown into confusion Saturday over the fate of a 24-year-old hostage threatened with execution in Iraq after two bodies discovered in as many days were determined to be of other people.

The day began with a pre-dawn news conference called by the foreign ministry which said US troops found a body north of Baghdad resembling Shohei Koda, a Japanese traveler abducted by Islamic militants linked to al-Qaida.

But when US forces flew the body to Kuwait, doctors at the Japanese Embassy there found that the height, head and dental structure did not match those of Koda, top Japanese government spokesman Hiroyuki Hosoda said.

"The medical officers at the embassy in Kuwait examined the body and they concluded that it is not likely that it is the remains of Mr. Koda," said Hosoda, the chief cabinet secretary.

"His dental structure is completely different," Hosoda said.

It was not immediately clear who the body belonged to or whether it would be flown back to Iraq.

Koda, who had reportedly gone to Iraq as a tourist and was abducted after he failed to find an affordable hotel, was threatened with death unless Japan pulled its military from Iraq by late Thursday, a demand refused by Tokyo.

Japan has about 550 troops stationed in Iraq on a humanitarian mission. It is Japan's first military deployment since World War II to an area of active fighting.

But Japan otherwise has a limited number of personnel in Iraq, particularly after the taking of five Japanese hostages in April, who were released, and the killings of two Japanese diplomats in an ambush last year.

During the latest hostage crisis, Japan has been dependent on the United States and its allies and on the Iraqi interim government, to which Tokyo is a major donor.

A press report Friday, hours after the deadline for Koda's execution passed, said the body of an Asian-looking man was found in the northern city of Tikrit.

But the body was of a truck driver with a large build, dark skin and black moustache, said Duraid al-Tikriti of Tikrit general hospital.

Koda's mother, a nurse who had pleaded to Islamic militants on Arabic television, has refused to accept her son was killed after being informed of developments by government officials, Japanese media said quoting relatives. AFP

Cambodians warmly embrace their new king

PHNOM PENH — Cambodians warmly embraced their little-known new monarch King Norodom Sihamoni Saturday, impressed by his graceful bearing and gentle speech as his ornate three-day coronation drew to an end.

The 51-year-old king was formally crowned Friday in an elaborate and solemn ceremony. In his first address to the nation Saturday, he promised to share his countrymen's "happiness and sadness forever."

Prak Sokhom, a pickle-seller doing a roaring trade from the thousands attending the event at the park outside the sprawling palace's gates, gushed over the youthful-looking King Sihamoni.

"His voice is very sweet and he is also very handsome. He is a good person, very gentle and suitable for the position," she said.

The new monarch, an unmarried former ballet dancer and cultural diplomat who has spent most of his life outside Cambodia, is barely known by his 13 million subjects.

But his glamorous appointment as king has excited many.

Ngoun Pheakdey, an 11-year-old streetwise scavenger said he originally planned to come here Saturday only to collect the rubbish the crowd left behind.

"I didn't plan to see him at all but I have seen him now and I am very happy that I did because he is the king!" he said.

"I don't know if he will rule well but I believe in him because he looks very gentle and kind. I hope that he will take care of the lives of children like us."

Cambodia's kings were once all-powerful but today the position is largely symbolic. Yet the monarchy remains highly respected and King Sihamoni's father Norodom Sihanouk styled himself as a protector of the country's vulnerable.

Kim Sreng, an orange-robed Buddhist monk observing the spectacle, said he was optimistic about the new king's abilities.

"His outside appearance is very good. His face is full of the four virtues of a good-natured man: compassion, piety, joy at others' happiness and sincerity," the 23-year-old said.

While Cambodia's older citizens, particularly in rural areas, still regard the king as semi-divine, King Sihamoni faces a tougher challenge winning over the young. Many are more concerned with economic survival in his war-scarred nation than the monarchy.

But university students hearing him speak gave him the thumbs-up.

"I am optimistic about his reign," said agricultural student Huot Luna, 23.

"The gentle look on his face, the respectful speech he gives, all of this helps me to believe more in him... I will wait and see what happens next but what I can confirm now is trust. I and my friends here hand our trust to him." AFP

Her father's daughter

ILOCOS Norte Rep. Imee Marcos has cut a high profile in the ongoing congressional inquiry into the alleged corruption in the Armed Forces of the Philippines. She tangled with the always-testy Interior Secretary Angelo Reyes over his mother's tax returns. She buttonholed another former AFP chief of staff, Diomedio Villanueva, about his willingness to disclose his Statement of Assets and Liabilities.

EDITORIAL When Maj. Gen. Carlos Garcia was a no-show at the first hearing, she threatened (a week ahead of Sen. Miriam Defensor-Santiago) to block the confirmation of offending military officials at the Commission on Appointments. When Garcia finally showed up, she speculated loudly about an alleged P50-million public relations offensive funded by generals.

At one point, a columnist in another newspaper described her as asking "searching questions" about various aspects of corruption in the military during the televised hearings.

High-profile stuff, except for one thing. Her questions were not searching enough. If anything, and taken together, they can be understood as an attempt to gloss over the fundamental reality that has marked the AFP the last 40 years. It was her father, the late dictator Ferdinand Marcos, who corrupted the military.

This is not to say that everyone in the AFP or even in the corps of generals, is necessarily corrupt. Or that those generals who are in fact corrupt bear no responsibility because the blame has been laid squarely at the foot of the dictator's glass coffin.

Corruption in the military, like corruption elsewhere in government, remains a matter of choice. Individuals make the personal decision to divert some of the budget, or accept a supplier's bribe, or favor an influential businessman in a locality. But Marcos created a culture in the military that made it easier for both officers and the rank and file to make the fatal choice.

The country's most successful politician started by politicizing the AFP. From his first election as president, until his last days as dictator, Marcos applied bailiwick politics ruthlessly. The most important demographics were Ilocano roots and personal loyalty. The best example remains the most obvious. Marcos maneuvered his cousin and former driver Fabian Ver through the ranks, finally appointing him AFP chief of staff over much more qualified officers.

By aggressively promoting those loyal to him personally and those who hailed from the so-called Solid North, Marcos devalued the traditional military virtues of courage and competence, merit and discipline.

Marcos then corrupted the military by rewarding his partisans and buying off others. Essentially, he turned generals into businessmen, even while they were in military service.

The stir over Garcia's many houses is a faint echo of public outrage over the generals' mansions that came to light in the mid-1980s—many of them in expensive residential villages near Camp Aguinaldo, all of them out of reach of a general's standard pay.

A consummate lawyer, Marcos worked hard to keep up legal appearances. He was quite vain about the legal justification for martial rule, which he called constitutional authoritarianism. But in truth, his regime was kept in power in part through the use of the military.

Thus, Marcos undermined the military by giving it a heady taste of political power. He brought the boys out of the barracks, as it were, and it has since been a struggle to keep them there.

In other words, he corrupted the military in the same way he corrupted Philippine democracy itself, by subverting it from within and undermining its foundations.

This is the reality that the dictator's daughter fails to see, or does not want us to see. If she were serious about reforming the AFP—which has been since 1986 a sometimes troubled but undeniably pro-democratic institution—she would begin by looking for traces of her father's rule. (They're everywhere.)

But that is as likely to happen as Garcia suddenly remembering a plausible justification for his unexplained wealth. No Marcos has even apologized for the excesses, the torture, the billion-dollar corruption, that marked the dark days of the dictatorship. We shouldn't hold our breath, expecting them to start now.

Kerry vs Bush

SEPARATE OPINION

Isagani A. Cruz

MANY Filipinos are interested in the outcome of the American presidential election this coming Tuesday. Like it or not, we have historic ties with the United States dating back to a hundred years ago, not to mention our sentimental attachment to anything Stateside like Elvis and Victoria's Secret. Additionally, the United States is playing the self-serving role, not generally accepted, of an international policeman. The results of the coming election will affect not only that country but also the rest of the world.

As an interested spectator, I am as anxious as many Filipinos over the current contest between the top contenders for the presidency of the United States. The latest surveys predict a neck-and-neck race between George W. Bush and John Kerry as if they were equine thoroughbreds. Most of these polls have been more or less accurate in the past although we can remember one surprising upset that saw the shoo-in Thomas Dewey defeated by "give-'em hell" Harry S. Truman. President Bush has a slight edge over Senator Kerry, but the margin is within what is called the margin of error.

My own fear is that President Bush will win the coming election although Senator Kerry appears to be more deserving. Merit is not always the principal criterion for choosing the President of the United States, because American voters tend to vote like the Filipino voters in recent years. We elected Joseph Estrada as president in 1998 and such misfits as Jinggoy Estrada, Bong Revilla and Lito Lapid to the Senate this year.

American voters are also not always intelligent in their choices. In 1921, they elected Warren Harding who by his own admission later was unfit for the presidency. In 1952 and 1956, they preferred Dwight D. Eisenhower, who was an undistinguished student in West Point, to the erudite Adlai Stevenson. They did choose brilliant thinkers like Thomas Jefferson and John Adams but they also elevated to the highest office in the land several candidates with little formal schooling. Lincoln was one of them, but he proved to be one of the greatest presidents.

According to the polls, Bush has substantial support that may win him his bid for reelection. Dubya is not known for scholastic achievement and has occasionally mutilated the English language, but he is at least not worse, although not better, than some previous occupants of the Oval Office. As former governor of Texas and during his current term as president, he has amassed tremendous experience in the art of governance that has earned him considerable backing from his admirers.

The Democrats have faulted him for his acts as commander in chief and stress that although he may have won the war against Iraq, he is losing the peace with American soldiers losing their lives daily against the insurgents. Also challenged are Bush's domestic policies which, Kerry says, have resulted in the deterioration of the economy and the discrimination of the middle class in favor of the millionaires. Kerry also differs with Bush on various other issues like abortion, medical insurance, and social welfare.

A serious apprehension of the Democrats is that if Bush loses in a clean election, he will cheat as he did in 2000. And he can do this more easily this time, now that he is the President of the United States with all his powers and influence. Al Gore won the popular vote in the last presidential election but lost the electoral vote because of vote-rigging in Florida, where Dubya's brother was the governor. Some say that even the federal Supreme Court connived in the cheating.

At any rate, I hope Kerry will be able to affect a similar Truman upset. He is not as apparently hopeless as Truman in 1948, but he is nonetheless in serious danger of being outmaneuvered by the Republicans in power. Still, it is not always the reelectionist who triumphs in a fair election, as witness Bill Clinton who clobbered Dubya's father in 1992, Roosevelt who beat Hoover in 1932, and Cleveland, who replaced Harrison in 1892. The winners, incidentally, were all Democrats.

Intellectually, Kerry outdistances Bush by a mile and won all the three presidential debates. He even looks more presidential than Bush. He will be more imposing than Bush in international conferences with his 6'2" height and his head of thick hair with just enough gray to give him an air of serious wisdom. These may seem superficial distinctions but they may count a lot in close elections. Many women voted for Clinton because, in Hillary's words, "he looked like a Viking."

And since we are being trivial, let us remember that superstition in US presidential elections. Candidates with double letters in their names are the lamedos. Thus, to cite recent examples, Bill Clinton beat George Bush, Jimmy Carter beat Gerald Ford, and Harry Truman beat Thomas Dewey. True, Lyndon Johnson defeated Barry Goldwater who had a double letter in his name. But as a rule, the superstition has proved true for William McKinley, Calvin Coolidge, Woodrow Wilson, Franklin Roosevelt, John Kennedy, and others. John Kerry may be next, so I'll keep my fingers crossed.

Conversion

MOMENTS

Fr. Jerry M. Orbos, SVD

I HEARD the story about a priest who went to Europe for the first time. He was rather short, but that was not a problem at all until he had to say his Sunday Mass. As he began the Mass, he realized that the altar was so high. All that the people could see was his face. He tried to remedy the situation by saying the sign of the cross starting from his forehead, then to his chin, then to his left cheek and ending with his right cheek.

In today's Gospel (Lk. 19, 1-10), we hear about Zaccheus who also tried to remedy his situation. Literally, he could not see Jesus because he was short. Spiritually he could not see Jesus because he was focused on the profits of this world, till he encountered the Prophet. He had to climb a tree to be able to see Jesus. He had to rise above himself and his situation. He had to leave the comfort and the safety of the solid ground where he was standing on so that he could see Jesus. If you could not really see God in your life, it is because you are not focused on Him. Or maybe it is because you refuse to leave behind the worldly treasures and attachments you are standing on.

There are times, as it were, when God literally dismantles the ground we are standing on so that we cling only to Him. In one instant, God can just move all that we have built so that we hold on only unto Him. Death, sickness, separation, failures are painful moments that eventually lead us to rely more on God rather than on ourselves. When the rug is pulled under your feet, perhaps it is because God sees how proud you stand, and He wants you to kneel and hold on to Him once again. He who knows how to kneel gets well and gets healed.

What a joy to see Art Romero, an ex-seminarian, at the Mass last Sunday. You see, a month ago I saw him at the ICU after he had a heart attack while playing tennis. The near death experience has made 47-year-old Art realize so many things in life. Having been at the doorstep of death, Art has realized that everything in this world is passing. At that point, nothing is really important, he said. All worldly possessions, all worldly cares just fade away, and the most important thing at that point, he said, is the impending encounter with God. He has experienced God in a very personal and in a very real way.

Now, Art, who was burdened by unforgiveness before, has learned to forgive, and has decided to focus his life on "things that really matter" from now on. He kept repeating how important the present moment is, how beautiful life is, and how wonderful God is. Yes Art, you are still alive because your mission is not yet accomplished in this life. One thing I know about Art is his personal devotion to the Blessed Mother. Now, more than ever, he told me that he prays the rosary with so much love. He always holds the rosary which I gave him at the ICU. Life for Art has become more simple, more peaceful and more serene because he has surrendered everything to God and to the Blessed Mother.

The road to conversion is not easy. In fact, it is not only bumpy. It could even be disastrous at times, but rest assured, the grace of God is working and, if we obey, we will find ourselves in His embrace and back home.

When a person has been touched by God, he is no longer the same. He begins to see himself and the world in God's eyes. This is what we call conversion. Lately, the daily papers have been filled with stories of conversion—not of the spiritual kind but conversion for worldly profit. Let us all pray that real conversion occur in our people, especially in our leaders who continue to amass wealth as if there was no more death and resurrection. I wonder what these greedy people who have plundered the nation will say to God at the end of their lives. They can justify and get away with their misdeeds before men, but not before God. Again I ask, how much money does one need to be happy in this life? When does one say "enough"? The bottom line is what Jesus Himself has asked: "What does it profit a man to gain the whole world, and in the end, lose his soul?"

May All Souls' Day remind us all that we have a soul, and that we will meet our Creator someday. May our meeting with God be a pleasant one. That all depends on how well we live our lives now.

An invitation for an Advent Recollection on Nov. 20, 2004, 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. at Bahay Ugnayan, Good Shepherd Convent, Aurora Boulevard, Quezon City, to be conducted by Sr. Purificacion Mendoza, FMDM. Interested parties may contact these numbers: 9115834/ 6331965/4266245/9283494 and 7231516.

Inviting you all to join the local pilgrimage to Naga, Legaspi and Sorsogon on Nov. 24 to 26. Please contact 5238581 to 89; 5214156 or 7217457.

A moment with the Lord:
 Lord, remind me that life is short, and that what matters most in the end is the love that I have shared with you and with people. Amen.

Abaya's valedictory

REVEILLE

Ramon J. Farolan

FEARLESS forecast—not that I have a dislike for conservative Republicans or a bias for liberal Democrats. But being a superstitious individual, I just can't see how Massachusetts Sen. John F. Kerry can lose after the Boston Red Sox scored the greatest comeback in major league baseball history, defeating the New York Yankees despite being three games down in the American League Championship Series. They then proceeded to crush the National League champions, the St. Louis Cardinals, in four straight games, ending what has been the "curse" of the Red Sox since 1918 when they last won a World Series. For the benefit of our readers, in 1920 the owners of the Red Sox, short of cash, traded pitcher Herman "Babe" Ruth to the New York Yankees where he would play as an outfielder and later become the home run king of baseball. For more than 80 years after giving up "the Bambino," as Babe Ruth was called, the Red Sox would lose all their World Series engagements—twice to the St. Louis Cardinals in 1946 and 1967.

Heroes of this historic Red Sox victory were a trio of Latinos from the Dominican Republic—David Ortiz, Pedro Martinez and the Most Valuable Player (MVP) of the series, Manny Ramirez. On Tuesday, John F. Kerry will be swept into office on the shoulders of the Red Sox nation.

There was a time when baseball was a favored sport in this country. I remember my late father taking me to the ballpark at the Rizal Memorial to watch the games of the Manila Bay Baseball League (MBBL). The Philippines and Japan were tops in the sport in Asia with private clubs like Canlubang showcasing Philippine baseball at its best. Today, basketball has completely dominated local athletic events to the detriment of other sports such as baseball and soccer.

Last Friday, in an emotionally charged valedictory, Gen. Nardiso Abaya, outgoing chief of staff of the Armed Forces of the Philippines, bowed out from military service with a sharp attack on civilian leadership and a press and media prone to sensationalism.

Abaya noted that 14 years after the Davide Fact-Finding Commission investigated the coup attempts of the late '80s, many of its recommendations have remained unacted upon by government. These recommendations pertain to conditions which breed disenchantment and instability in AFP ranks, and continue to hamper even the most sincere of reform movements.

Enumerating some of the unresolved issues, Abaya stressed that: (1) civilian leaders and supporters of coup attempts have never been made accountable for their participation in extra-constitutional uprisings. This passivity in the dispensation of justice has perpetuated the audacity and brazenness of plotters to agitate, provoke and exploit morale issues in the AFP.

(2) "Political grandstanding and the unfair and humiliating treatment and criticism of military officers by Congress and other public officials have long been identified as a bane to military professionalism. And yet, even today we hear of politicians dangling congressional confirmation as if it were a prize for us to kowtow, or to perform a trick to satisfy one's ego." (This line from Abaya's speech elicited the longest and loudest applause from the audience.) He said these circumstances run counter to the recommendation for setting up a system which would avoid exploitation of the confirmation process for political purposes. The Davide Commission recommended confirmation hearings for only the positions of chief of staff and the major service commanders. Today, Abaya observed, "nothing has changed and our colonels and our young officers, indirectly, are early on made vulnerable to the possibility of political patronage."

(3) The Davide Commission suggested that the military and the Commission on Audit work out a standard method that harmonizes the needs of the field and the bureaucratic technicalities of disbursement. Rigid systems, then and now, remain unresponsive to realities on the ground, presenting everyday dilemmas to our commanders. The AFP had long sought to address this problem by presenting proposals to the COA but these had not gained support. Thus, a problem identified 14 years ago—many say it is a "necessary evil"—today remains un-addressed. (This has reference to the practice of "conversion" in the use of AFP funds.)

(4) The role of media in public service. Abaya expressed concern that "all too often, rumor-reporting and trial by publicity can aggravate rather than resolve crises." He went on to say "I do not have a prescription but let me paraphrase the Davide Commission's recommendation—The resolution of the dilemma faced by media in crisis reporting lies more in the media itself rather than government regulations...Because the preferred option is self-regulation and self-discipline, media should proceed with their initiatives in formulating their own ethical standards."

As he moved to the end of his farewell speech, there were seconds of silence as he strove to keep his emotions under control. Abaya acknowledged that "I have never aspired to be popular or to be great. And in the twilight of my career, I am content with the thought I did my duty to the best of my abilities.... In all humility, I may not have been the best chief of staff that you challenged me to be. But I assure you, Madame President, that I gave my very best."

Talking with young women

CAGAYAN DE ORO—At the end of the first day of the "Orientation on Gender Issues for Young Women Leaders in Mindanao," sponsored by Pilipina through the support of the Friedrich Ebert Foundation, we asked the participants two questions. "Has it been easy for you to be a girl?" "What strikes you most about today's inputs and discussions?"

The group reports, which we asked the young women to "sum up" by way of hand-drawn posters, ranged from a hopeful diagram of a caterpillar's metamorphosis into a butterfly, to an illustration of a girl's "gender journey" from the cocoon of ignorance to wings of independence and awareness; to a painful depiction of a woman in chains bearing a cross struggling toward sunlight and hope.

The sharing was rich with personal experience and insights, some painful, others humorous and ironic, all honest and "from the heart."

For the most part, the young women spoke of first-hand experiences with discrimination not at the hands of men but at the hands of their parents. One spoke of being discouraged by her parents from pursuing a medical course, with her father telling her: "If you were a boy, then I would not have second thoughts about spending the money on you." Others mentioned discriminatory rules on curfews and socializing, with parents dismissing the girls' protests with a succinct "men cannot be raped." Another recalled growing up with the impression that "sex is bad," mainly because the topic of sex was rarely, if ever, discussed at home.

As one of the group reporters expressed: "When we question our parents' restrictions, they tell us to trust them and follow them because they've been down that road before. But we want to tell our parents that we want to follow a different road, and how will we know what road is for us if they will not allow us to explore on our own?"

THEIR "ates" and "ritzes" in Pilipina, who had made the same journey into feminism 20 or so years before, were shocked. First, because these were much the same issues of discrimination and denial, suppression and silence that we raved and ranted against all those many years ago. And second, because we realized that the "parents" these young women were complaining about belonged to "our" generation. "We" were the parents who were making their lives miserable! Did our own children feel the same way?

AT LARGE

Indeed, the same problems remain, resistant to change, and taking on new forms. If they were to disappear entirely from our social and personal landscape, perhaps there would no longer be any need for a women's movement.

But what seems to have changed is the attitude the young women of today bring to their situation. Where in our time we were fueled by rage at the persistence of gender inequities, and daunted by the sheer number and severity of the problems that needed addressing, the young women we were talking with expressed an exhilarating sense of discovery and enlightenment. "We want to know the ways to break free and the ways we can use our freedom to fully become ourselves," said one rapporteur.

THE 75 young women had come from Cagayan de Oro and other towns in Misamis Oriental, from Butuan and Agusan del Sur, Davao, Bukidnon and Marawi.

We greatly appreciated the presence of our young Muslim women, who were observing Ramadan; still they participated fully and energetically in the discussions and group activities despite the fact that they were fasting.

It was they who brought up the conflicts between their loyalty to and pride in their traditions and culture, and the restrictions these placed on them, as women, and their search for a workable, reasonable balance.

Of all the presentations on the first day, the most remarkable, the young women said, was an animated film, long a staple of feminist consciousness-raising, called "Impossible Dream."

The film depicts, in a highly humorous manner, the "typical" life of a wife and mother, and the heavy burden of responsibilities she bears, from homemaking to childbearing to child-rearing. Then the woman is shown relaxing and dreaming of life under a different arrangement, specifically one where her husband and the father of her children takes up his share of household and family responsibilities. Is this indeed an "impossible dream?"

I don't know if it was the humorous approach or the simple truths outlined in the film. Perhaps it was the way the film fleshed out the theories we were discussing and exploring. Or was it because the young women found the topic "funny" because, with most of them still single, they had yet to confront the realities of the double burden?

THE PAST two days have been such a rich learning opportunity, and not just for the young, or rather, younger women.

We may have been doing the talking, sharing and raising of consciousness. But we have also been learning, discovering new areas of feminist discourse as well as recognizing the persistence of certain forms of gender-based discrimination—especially in the family—that we have forgotten or have even been unconsciously practicing as parents.

Remmy Rikken, one of Pilipina's founding mothers, recalled that early in our feminist formation, we relied on a book called "My Mother, Myself" as the basic outline of our consciousness-raising sessions to explore how we "grew" into the women we had become, to recognize what needed changing and what needed to be preserved. One of the things we want to preserve and enrich is the link between mothers and daughters, pursuing the unfinished conversation where we seek to impart life lessons and wisdom; opening our daughters' eyes to painful realities that, we hope, we have not somehow helped preserve; and, in fact, enlisting their help in eradicating them.

The military in a corrupt society

"MORE than any other comparable Filipino elite, the officer corps had been created and defined by the nation. No other group had its social role, ideology and personal values so directly, so fundamentally shaped by the state." So writes the historian Alfred W. McCoy in his fascinating book, "Closer Than Brothers" (Anvil Publishing), a comparative study of two batches in the Philippine Military Academy—the classes of 1940 and 1971.

Only 30 years separate these two PMA classes from one another, notes McCoy, and yet the difference in mind-set is so sharp that one would have thought they were bred by two distinct institutions. "Class '40" was a study of successful military socialization.... Graduating on the eve of war, Class '40 won honors for fighting enemy invaders, were ennobled by privation in Japanese prisoner war camps, and emerged with their bonds and values stiffened.... As soldiers in a society permeated by patronage politics, Class '40 faced incessant pressures to compromise. Their careers required, on a daily basis, mediation of the paradoxical, even contradictory role of the military in a democratic society—subordinated to politicians yet apolitical; armed yet nonviolent, all-powerful yet powerless."

At the other end is Class '71, "a study in the breakdown of military socialization," says McCoy. "Instead of fighting enemy invasion, the young lieutenants of Class '71 were brutalized by combat against Muslims in Mindanao and interrogation of suspected subversives in Manila.... They emerged from a decade in the safe houses of the Marcos regime with a superman sense of themselves as creator/destroyers who could seize the state and transform society."

It was to Class '40 that men of honor like Gen. Victor Osias and Commodore Ramon Alcaraz, who both refused to compromise with Marcos, belonged. Addressing the members of the PMA class of 1990, who had joined the 1987 coup as cadets, Alcaraz sharply reminded his young audience of what it meant to be a soldier: "Go forth out there and be a strong moral force in transforming the military into a profession of honor which it used to be."

To Class '71, on the other hand, belong the officers who plotted the 1986 coup that led to Edsa I, and controversial figures like colonel and former senator Gregorio Honasan who mounted coups against the Aquino government, and police general and now senator Panfilo Lacson, whose record McCoy associates with torture and summary execution of criminal suspects. McCoy's unkindest depiction of them is as political egomaniacs who played god. Nowhere in the book is there a mention of Maj. Gen. Carlos Garcia, another member of this class. The information that the US government has shared about the amount of money that General Garcia and his family have brought into the United States over the past 10 years demonstrates the magnitude of corruption in the military. An updated version of the book would no doubt include a whole chapter on General Garcia—one more proof of the decline of honor among the officers who were initiated into the cynical ways of power under Marcos.

It would be unfair to single out one PMA batch and ascribe to it all the failings of military leadership. But indeed no PMA class has figured in more controversies as the Class of '71. This class clearly counted in its ranks many strong individuals with great leadership potential. McCoy's point is that these soldiers used these qualities to ruin the nation in whose image they were cast, because somewhere along the way they lost their basic military values and began to imagine themselves as worthy players in a society ruled by corrupt politicians.

McCoy explains this as a failure of military socialization. This view places the onus of responsibility for the failings of the officer corps on the Philippine Military Academy and its curriculum. We may need to dig deeper than that to understand the problem.

It is a fact that the modern values instilled in the minds of PMA cadets bear little resemblance to the distorted values of our society. But this is nothing unusual. The education of a student in any of our better universities features the same discrepancy. There is nothing wrong with the socialization of our young people. But the ideals they learn at school are easily negated by the practical realities of the world into which they are subsequently thrown. Members of the Class of 1940 remained men of honor because they did not have to contend with political leaders as vicious as those we have today. Like the rest of their generation, they were animated by the spirit of nation-building. Today's politicians are seldom gripped by such ideals. You cannot have professional soldiers in a nation governed by corrupt and incompetent leaders. They will either try to seize power or become part of the rotten system.

Ex-Captain Rene Jarque says as much in a poignant letter he recently wrote to his fellow Filipino West Pointers: "We have known the rottenness of the system all along and how the culture in the AFP was not and is not conducive to professional growth and honest conduct. It was never reflective of the Academy's motto, 'Duty, Honor, Country.' Some of us gave it a chance, found it unwieldy and incorrigible, and left. Some stuck with the system and played it out only to be sucked into the vortex of corruption and unprofessional conduct. I was trying my best to be as professional and as patriotic but I could never be honest given the extent of the graft and corruption in the AFP. And that was, I believed, unacceptable to my sense of honor and integrity. Hence, I left."

Departure area

A WING of the first floor of the Jesuit residence in Loyola has two special places—a chapel and, at the back of it are the medical rooms, equipped with hospital beds, for ailing Jesuits. There's a clinic station with nurses on duty every day. We call this clinic/hospice, the "Departure Area" because the next journey for most of the Jesuit patients there was the final one—to the Jesuit Novitiate Resting Place.

Now, in the University of the Philippines campus, we say a friend—especially if already old—is in the Departure Area if he or she is seriously ill. But, sometimes, we overuse the term. When we feel extremely sick, we tell friends we are in the Departure Area.

I'm not really sick, immobile, semi-blind or semi-deaf, and I pray to God, never to make me a candidate of that dreaded, old-age illness called "Alzheimer." But I am house-bound, not allowed to go out alone, not even to church which is only two blocks away. I'm never left alone in the house. There must always be someone—a maid, a granddaughter or a grandson—who must be with me in the house. One morning, my oldest granddaughter, Bang, admonished me, "Please Lola, when we are all still asleep, don't go out to the garden." The time was six o'clock in the morning. I would have been off to Mass if I could walk by myself.

Why the admonition? I have a pacemaker. My cardiologist said I'm not to die of heart attack, but if I slipped and banged my head, or broke my hips, the medical problem would be more worrisome and serious.

So, what do I do now? I am neither in the Departure Area nor too far from it. I'm 86 years old. I undergo physical therapy—to exercise the limbs, especially the legs. I use a cane, when I venture out. My bath must be prepared for me because I have to sit down on a chair. I hear, "Please Lola don't lock the door," every time I am in the comfort room.

I shouted once—only once—in our 57 years of marriage, when my husband automatically locked the bathroom door. I was astonished at the loudness of my voice: "NVM I told you not to lock the door!" I used his name and spoke in English, too. I'm more articulate in English, being an Ilocano-Cebuano, and a half-baked Tagalog. NVM was already having dialysis then. And I knew that many accidents happen in the bathroom. I justified the shouting because of my mounting fear for NVM's health and he knew that.

Without making it too apparent to my family, I am preparing for my final journey. I cannot forget how an uncle in Zamboanga prepared for his final trip. At one time, while I was in his house to spend the night, I happened to see a coffin, painted black, resting securely on three roof beams. It was for him, and he was not even sick then.

No, I don't have a pre-selected coffin yet. I haven't decided what color it should be. But I have prepared a will, and in there I have written that I want to be cremated, my urn of ashes to be buried beside my husband. I have to finalize this burial request. I already have a large photograph, used in the Fokien Times yearbook and recently also printed in the Philippine Tatler. Who really started this pictorial display over one's coffin?

I have told some members of our Tuesday Circle choir that my favorite songs are "Amazing Grace," "Come Holy Spirit," and "Our Father." They'll know what to sing then. "Hindi Kita Malilimutan" is another favorite.

A special going-away party for terminal cancer patients, I cannot forget. My friend, wife of an American professor in Hayward, California, knew her time was up. So did her Ilocano relatives and friends. We were invited to attend this farewell gathering. Our "celebrant patient" was seated in the center of her circle of friends and relatives. There was singing as she was being given a crown of flowers. There was more singing and prayers. But there was no funeral atmosphere, no crying or weeping. What was unusual to me was that my dying friend had also selected who was to be her American husband's second wife. And she was one of her Ilocano friends. Some years ago, I jokingly told my children that should I go first, my husband has the permission to marry again, but only after three years. I don't know why I specified three years.

Only the Almighty Lord knows the time and hour of one's departure to His Home. May all departure areas be happy and peaceful places. While waiting for the Lord to call our names, we have to continually pray that He stays with us, by our side, always.

TALK of the TOWN

How should we manage our debt?

THE DIFFERENT views featured in Talk of the Town about the causes of the fiscal crisis and the measures that need to be taken to fix the economy continue to elicit reactions from readers here and abroad.

The debate between economists from the University of the Philippines and members of non-government organizations, on the one hand, and between certain NGOs themselves, on the other, prompted Edwin A. Sumcad to submit an article on the fiscal crisis.

Sumcad, who is based in the United States, says the cause of the crisis is corruption—the filching of capital infusions from abroad.

He suggests that the Philippines learn something from South Korea, which has curbed corruption, pursued rapid industrialization and adopted an outward-looking strategy.

For him, cutting ties to the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank is suicidal.

But economist Alejandro Lichauco claims that the country is poor precisely because of the policies of the Washington-based multilateral agencies. He says that IMF prescriptions of opening up the domestic market to imports, devaluation, and fiscal and monetary restraint have led to the destruction of local industries and cuts in social services.

He wants the government to unilaterally repudiate the country's debt, the most radical proposal advanced so far to address the debt problem.

RP can learn from the Korean experience

By Edwin (Ed.S.) A. Sumcad

The problem with "scholars" jumping to the rescue is that in a purported attempt to put out the fire, gasoline is thrown into it. Studies and recommendations turned out to be claptrap coming from politicized or subverted economists. We know most of them as rabid advocates of the 1970s' inward-looking nationalism if not ultra-nationalists who are more loyal to their political agenda than to the country.

Ultra-nationalism divides the country, especially when left-leaning radicals fight among themselves over what is supposed to be good for the country after Ferdinand E. Marcos left the scene. They only agree on one thing: blame foreign investment, development aid and external debt as the culprit in all of the nation's woes.

The economy is limping. It is suicidal to attack and sever relations with the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank. (Examine the fiscal crisis papers that opposed each other, i.e., the UP, Bello et. al. reports, trade liberalization and tariff reforms of polarized graduate students, etc. that appeared in the Inquirer News Service among others.)

In the fiscal crisis debate, contrary to the position of those "scholars," public debt, regardless of size, is not a deathblow to the economy. In fact, it is required. It is debt mismanagement and massive corruption (as in the case of Argentina and the Philippines) that push the economy to the verge of collapse. It is not really what they say it is.

Benign

The truth of the matter is that the $56.3 billion debt burden of the Philippines as of September 2004 is not something for ultra-nationalists to scare the hell out of a disquieted nation. In fact, it may be categorized only as "benign."

South Korea's external liabilities totaled $129.7 billion at the end of 1999, the seventh largest in the world. Brazil topped the list with $244.6 billion, followed by Russia's $173.9 billion and Mexico's $166.9 billion.

South Korea is now the world's showcase on how massive foreign debt pulled the nation from morass to become a newly industrialized country. In 1990, it was the 10th most indebted country with $34.9 billion of debt and the fourth with $136.9 billion in 1997 when the country was hit hardest by the Asian financial crisis. The Philippines is far removed from this debt list debacle.

Classroom exercise

The Korean economy had the world's worst short-term maturing liabilities, making attempts at solving the Philippine problem by members of the academe like a classroom exercise. Within less than one year, this fiscal nightmare reached $34.7 billion in 1999, topping the list of more than 140 economically disabled indebted countries.

It is how massive debts are managed that gives imperiled nations a life-defining outcome. For instance, in the mismanaged case of the Philippines, if maturing debt payments are backed up by healthy foreign exchange reserves, there should have been no cause for alarm. But in debt management, the Philippines and South Korea parted in so many ways.

The Philippine ratio of short-term liabilities to its meagerly foreign exchange reserves violated international safeguards, thus the country has been unable to ward off impending disasters like what is now causing this finger pointing. Under deathwatch, Korean leaders pegged this ratio at 45 percent on the average—well below the 60 percent which is considered stable under World Bank standards. In the case of the Philippines, politicized ultra-nationalists barked up the wrong tree when they attacked the prescribed life jackets for a drowning economy.

The first step South Koreans took was to deworm the country of the corruption parasite the Syngman Rhee's First Republic had infected the nation. As in the case of Argentina, high government officials spent time behind bars.

Rapid industrialization
Poor in natural resources, with low savings rate and a small domestic market, South Korea's subsequent rapid industrialization relied on an outward-looking strategy. Government initiatives played an important role in this process. The inflow of foreign capital was greatly encouraged to supplement the shortage of domestic savings. Ultra-nationalism and petty politics slowly gave way to the private sector's chaebol cooperative engagement with the government starting, in the 1990s, with long-term investments programmed toward competing in the global market. Production and marketing of Korean cars worldwide are among the proof of this success.

While the future of the Philippines is bleak, that of South Korea is bright, although the chaebol concept of industrialization may yet be challenged by the imponderables of globalization. Nonetheless, in debt management, South Koreans learned the ropes fast enough. Unlike the Edsa leadership, Koreans in government are no longer paralyzed with fear that their massive foreign debt, one of the world's highest per capita, may deal their economy a deathblow.

The most irritating problem that insults the mentality of the public is that those politicized "scholars" in Manila still don't get it—this national crisis is not caused by what they are harping about but by the Edsa mentality and massive corruption that is bleeding the nation dry.

Debauchery
Since Marcos' time, this debauchery has grown larger and larger, smarter and smarter. This is exactly the case of Argentina. Corruption forced Argentina to sink into the quagmire of huge mismanaged debt fatal to the economy as what is now happening in the Philippines, except that notorious crooks in the Philippines are not incarcerated.

The Philippines can be saved

Repudiate the debt

By Alejandro Lichauco

We have become a land of hungry people, where hungry mothers sell their bodies and their babies, where hungry fathers sell their kidneys, where hungry farmers eat field rats, where hungry parents seek work even in terror-stricken Iraq, where hungry infants die every day at the nation's public hospitals, and where hungry children begging for food in the nation's streets have become as common a sight as uncollected garbage.

Having been in the active, continuous supervision of the economy since 1962, the International Monetary Fund (IMF) must accept primary responsibility for the consequences of its policy prescriptions.

A major consequence and by-product of those prescriptions has been the foreign debt for which the IMF must take full responsibility. Those policy prescriptions, notably devaluation, have backfired and aggravated the poverty problem. This is a fact acknowledged by no less than the staff of the IMF in a study released in 1988.

For insisting on those prescriptions, the IMF must be held to have acted in bad faith.

The policy prescriptions—being a deadly mix of the continuous opening of the domestic market to imports, continuous devaluation of the peso and fiscal-monetary restraint—have led to and explain the destruction of local industries, the continuous rise in prices and a depressive influence on business as well as in unnecessary cuts in welfare services.

The IMF prescriptions have proved to be a formula for hunger.

The policy prescriptions were designed to suppress industrialization. The IMF and the World Bank opposed the effort of Ferdinand Marcos to start industrialization based on 11 major industrial projects.

Foreign loans, which translate into the foreign debt, were the carrot and stick with which the IMF persuaded a succession of submissive governments to accept the deadly mix of prescriptions.

As part of its strategy to have the Philippine government accept its policy prescriptions, the IMF utilized the nation's major economic functionaries, notably the debt negotiators, for the purpose, improperly inducing in them a behavioral pattern of double allegiance.

The continued existence of the foreign debt deprives the Philippines of its economic sovereignty so that as long as those debts are outstanding, the country continues to be subject to the onerous conditionalities of the IMF, leaving the government powerless to adopt an independent developmental strategy appropriate to the real needs of the nation—particularly the need to transform into a newly industrialized country.

The repercussions of the foreign debt and servicing thereof violate the basic human rights of the people to devise a socioeconomic system that would ensure full employment and enable them to lift themselves from a life of hunger and deprivation to which the IMF conditionalities have purposely condemned them.

The foreign debt is both the symbol of the nation's enslavement as well as the weapon with which the IMF, described by Malaysia's former Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad as "agents of the new colonialism," keeps the Filipino people enslaved and preserved in poverty and underdevelopment as the old colonialism did.

The Senate of the Philippines, as the proper highest policy-making body of the land, and which has the power of review over treaty commitments and agreements entered into by the Executive Department, now has the inescapable obligation to the Filipino people to initiate the process of debt repudiation through a resolution declaring in the sense of the chamber that the debt should be unilaterally repudiated.

The proposed Senate resolution should be transmitted to the United Nations along with a formal complaint against the IMF denouncing that body for having deliberately created the debt problem through policies that have transformed the Philippines—once the most promising and best performing economy in East Asia—into a humanitarian disaster.

Dollar RoPs can be a blessing or a curse

By Romeo L. Bernardo

One aspect of government's debt problem that seems to have missed scrutiny is the large share of dollar-denominated securities issued in the international capital markets. Popularly known as RoPs, these securities comprise 42 percent of government's outstanding foreign debt in 2003 compared with just 11 percent in 1999 (from almost nil in the early 1990s). What is the significance of this?

As has been often discussed, this large exposure to the capital markets means that unlike in the past decade, government today is much more exposed to the international market's mood swings. This makes it vulnerable to the "event risk," or the risk of some unexpected "news," economic or political, causing markets to close down abruptly, with government either unable to refinance its maturing obligations or to refinance at reasonable terms.

With the country's large refinancing requirements (roughly $3 billion in 2005, not counting refinancing needs of private dollar bond issuers), a sudden confidence run can be costly in terms of the additional spread demanded by the market, or worse, can precipitate a payments crisis.

Less talked about is the link between fiscal solvency and financial sector solvency resulting from this RoPs. Given the attractiveness of RoPs yield-wise (estimated after tax peso return of 18 percent for the 10-year bond), and regulation-wise (no capital charge under currently-adopted risk-based capital standards), local banks have become major buyers of RoPs.

It is estimated that about $9 billion out of $13 billion assets of local foreign currency deposit units are invested in RoPs. In addition to booking RoPs, banks have also developed derivative instruments with RoPs as underlying assets that multiply leverage and vulnerability. These activities provide a channel through which a fiscal crisis can feed into a financial crisis.

By itself, the fact that a significant portion of RoPs are held by local banks, either for their own or their trust accounts, offers some comfort as local investors can be expected to have greater appetite for its own government's risk. This helps to insulate government from any knee-jerk market reaction.

Also, in all likelihood, most de-positors do not even realize that their banks are heavily invested in RoPs, or even if they do, have limited options to move deposit accounts out of the country, especially with stringent international protocols in place pertaining to anti-money laundering. Likewise, under existing prudential standards where RoPs are zero risk weighted, buying RoPs is a "no-brainer" for banks and thus, banks and their clients constitute a captive market for these government issues.

From a financial sector stability viewpoint, however, the magnitude of bank exposure to government risk gives one pause. At the time of its debt default in 2001, Argentina's banks were similarly exposed to government risk through their holdings of government local and foreign currency bonds and loans.

Although total exposure was not extreme—reportedly 21 percent of total assets in 2000—this was a source of vulnerability for the banking system, especially when confidence started to wane and depositors ran for the exit. As analysts observed, moves in 2000 to de-link the financial system from the fiscal problem, e.g., marking government bonds to market, required positive weighting for government loans, came a little too late to shield the system from the fiscal blowup.

Of course, the Philippines is not in the same boat as Argentina. Argentina's crisis was a confluence of several factors, consisting not only of weak public finances and a banking system vulnerable to government default, but perhaps most importantly, an overvalued currency due both to the appreciation of the dollar (to which the Argentine peso was pegged under a currency board arrangement) against the euro (Argentina's major trading partners) and the devaluation of Brazil's currency, which reduced the competitiveness of Argentina's exports.

Thus, while Argentina's fiscal deficits like ours ran unabated, it also incurred deficits in its current account and experienced declines in its international reserves, at the same time that its domestic economy was contracting.

(Bernardo, a former finance undersecretary, is the president of Lázaro Bernardo Tiu & Associates, Inc.)

by any leader endowed with enough economic sense, but not by any pretender to the presidency whose associates in power are likened to carnivorous dinosaurs ready to devour the nation's patrimony.

Missing their target by miles, those politicized crisis papers are at their best, histrionics, and at their worst, toxic. What is striking is the suggestion to tax some more the already economically anemic population, that is, to suck out more blood money from the suffering wage earners. It could light the fuse of civil strife across the country.

Taxes will backfire

The notion that to tax will give the government more money to balance the budget is at best palliative if not misleading. It will hit back the economy because more taxes can contract the economy. The government sucks money from corporate and household spenders, and gives it to foreign creditors because of the heavy debt burden, if not stashed away as private bank deposits abroad of crooks in government. Hardly is there any left to pump back into the system that would make the economy move forward (refer to the Harold-Donnar model).

Trade liberalization and tariff reform issues may be regarded only as the tail, not the eye, of this raging fiscal storm. What those recommendations hope to achieve depends largely on a well-defined situation, which is not the case in the present imbroglio, because the cause of the crisis is dimensional. For example, to steal the nation's resources is not a component of the equilibrium equation between national savings and investment where national income can be skillfully manipulated to rise. Thus, if this attitudinal and material corruption is neither purged out of the system nor addressed in determining the cause of the problem, those "scholars" are just wasting their saliva and absconding with our time.

Filipinos are trapped in odious debt, hence this crisis, because the capital infusions did not go to the model of economic development. Those resources were systematically plundered. What you have is not only fiscal but economic crisis of inexcusable nightmarish proportions.

Ilocos Norte town mayor murdered

By Cristina Arzadon
PDI Northern Luzon Bureau

LAOAG CITY—Mayor Eleuterio Mabanag, 58, of Vintar, Ilocos Norte, was jogging on his usual route in his town on Saturday morning when three men shot him at close range. Mabanag died instantly.

His police escort, SPO1 Nestor de San Juan, was also killed while a civilian escort, Rogelio de Leon, was wounded and taken to a hospital.

Senior Supt. Rolando Rabara, Ilocos Norte police director, said Mabanag and his two escorts were jogging at Barangay Margaay at 6:20 a.m. Saturday when two or three armed men approached them and without provocation started shooting them. Vintar police investigators said the suspects used M-14 and M-16 rifles in the attack.

A witness, who was also jogging at that time, told investigators that one suspect was wearing military fatigue pants and a ski mask. The witness failed to describe the other suspects.

"The ski mask-wearing suspect approached Mabanag while he was jogging near an irrigation canal and shot him at close range," Rabara said, quoting the witness.

Mabanag had been taking his daily exercises at that route, a popular jogging area.

Gunshots

The witness said it was only minutes after he passed by Mabanag's group when he heard the gunshots.

Rabara said the police were looking at political and personal rivalry as the motive for the killing.

Mabanag, a former vice mayor, was serving his second term as mayor of Vintar, 5 km from this city. He won over his closest rival Eric Ong during the May 10 elections this year.

Mabanag served the unexpired term of former Mayor Juanito Albano who died after the 2001 elections.

Police and election officials described the 2004 elections in Vintar as "bloody," with supporters of Mabanag and Ong resorting to violence and political attacks before the elections.

Unsolved murders

urday morning and met with local police officials.

Aglipay visited the crime scene and ordered Rabara to hunt the suspects.

Ilocos Norte Gov. Ferdinand Marcos Jr. earlier pressed the alarm bell due to the spate of killings in Ilocos Norte. He also sought Aglipay's help in solving the string of unsolved murders in the province.

Mabanag's killing was the latest violent incident in the province this month. Last week, a village captain in Pinili town was gunned down by his brother.

Church questions militia recruitment in Occidental Mindoro

CITY OF CALAPAN—Church leaders here questioned the recruitment by the military of militiamen for the counter insurgency operation in Occidental Mindoro.

The Apostolic Vicariate of San Jose (AVC-SJ), through Bishop Antonio Palang, issued a three-page pastoral statement questioning the recruitment of members of the Civilian Armed Forces Geographical Unit (Cafgu).

"Is it really true that the peace and order situation in the province has reached the point that there is now a need to solicit the help of civilians for military operations?" the statement said.

"In cases where there is conflict between the assessments of the military and the village officials, what will prevail? And supposing the paramilitary men are in the line of duty, will they not just be a cannon fodder?" the statement asked.

The AVC-SJ cited the abuses committed by what used to be called the Civilian Home Defense Force, which, it said, was used by individuals with vested interests, including corrupt politicians, for their private armies.

Former Sen. Wigberto Tañada, the Senate human rights committee chair in the 1990s, himself recommended the dis-manting of the militia, said the statement.

Palang said that in the pursuit of justice, the recruitment of Cafgu members would not do anything good as the usual motive of one in joining, if not for a living, is hatred, for revenge or access to firearms.

In Sta. Cruz town, members of the Sangguniang Pambayan and league of barangays, in a meeting Sept. 28, passed a five-page position paper entitled "Ayaw namin ng Civilian Armed Forces Geographical Unit (We don't want Cafgu)."

The paper said 2Lt. Jerico Mangalus, Alpha company commanding officer and spokesperson of the 16th Infantry Battalion, Philippine Army, told residents in a symposium on Sept. 23 that 90 percent of the people of Sta. Cruz were New People's Army members or sympathizers.

"There's no need to form a Cafgu," said Sangguniang Bayan board member Oscar Catama.

"The applicants in our village are petitioners for land and they would just like to have firearms..." said Loregim Isidro, barangay captain of Alcaak. Madonna T. Virola, PDI Southern Luzon Bureau

TACLOBAN CITY—"I am happy and overwhelmed."

That was how Jhonor Leanda, a 17-year-old single mother, described how she felt after giving birth to triplets—two girls and a boy—on Friday at the Eastern Visayas Regional Medical Center (EVRMC) of this city.

Jhonor, however, said that she has yet to see her triplets who were, upon delivery, placed separately in incubators by physicians.

The first-time mother, who delivered the three babies by cesarian operation, is in good condition. But the babies need close monitoring due to their very fragile health conditions, Dr. Cecil Allah said.

Jhonor delivered the babies on her eighth month of pregnancy. She stayed at the delivery room for almost three hours.

"We are taking a close monitoring of the three babies as they were born premature. Two of them have developed tachypnea or fast breathing (sic)," Allah told the INQUIRER. Otherwise, she said, the three are in "stable condition."

Allah, who is one of the pediatricians that are looking after the babies, said the triplets were given the names Maria Joana, Maria Josephine and Norjohn by their proud grandfather, Federico, 36.

Norjohn and Maria Joana were the ones who developed tachypnea, according to Allah.

Based on the records of the hospital, Jhonor delivered Maria Joana at 1:24 a.m., with both Norjohn and Maria Josephine coming out in quick succession, separated by just a few seconds. Official records of the hospital, however, showed that the two younger children were delivered at 1:25 a.m.

Norjohn weighed 2,200 grams while her two sisters both weighed 1,800 grams.

The young mother told the INQUIRER that she knew that she would be delivering triplets as she underwent an ultrasound examination when she was seven months pregnant.

Arrests lead police to thriving drug trade in Nueva Vizcaya jail

BAYOMBONG, Nueva Vizcaya—Local government and police officials have uncovered widespread drug trafficking inside the provincial jail, confirming earlier reports that drug lords have penetrated the provincial capitol for their activities.

This developed as members of the Criminal Investigation and Detection Group (CIDG) earlier arrested two suspected drug pushers in a shabu buy-bust operation within the provincial capitol here where the provincial jail is situated.

Arrested were Noel Feliciano, 38, a former inmate, and Romulo Lictawa, 36. Feliciano yielded .5 gram of shabu and P1,000 in marked money.

Lictawa, an inmate at the provincial jail, was arrested in a follow-up operation. Seized from him were .5 gram of shabu and P1,000 in marked money.

Sources

"According to the suspects, the drugs came from the provincial jail," Insp. Ronald Tique, provincial CIDG officer, said.

Tique said Lictawa and Feliciano had told investigators that an inmate and a suspected drug pusher earned P30,000 a week by peddling shabu inside the jail.

The incident prompted the police to conduct a surprise search and inspection of the jail which houses 207 inmates.

Police recovered from a cell drug paraphernalia such as sachets for shabu, improvised tools and assorted knives. Also recovered were marked money used by CIDG operatives during the buy-bust operation.

The cell was used by inmates who had been designated as jail trustees, Benzon Cadiente, provincial warden, said.

A security guard who requested anonymity said there was no regular inspection of cells to check drug peddling in the jail.

The provincial board last week approved a resolution authored by Board Member Patricio Dumlaog Jr. seeking a mandatory drug test for guards in the provincial jail and capitol.

Youth groups seek greater role in peace process

DAVAO CITY—Some 50 youth organizations representing the lumad, Moro and settler communities in Mindanao converged at a three-day youth summit here that ended on Thursday.

During the summit, the youths drafted a proposal called the Young People's Summit Declaration, which seeks "greater participation of young people in the grassroots monitoring of the ceasefire agreement" between the government and the Moro Islamic Liberation Front (MILF).

The draft also listed some of their sector's problems.

Copies of the proposal were submitted to the government and the MILF according to Balay Mindanao, a non-government organization that hosted the summit.

William Banzali, president of the United Youth of the Philippines-Davao Oriental Chapter, said being the main victims of armed hostilities in conflict-affected areas, young people want a greater role in the peace process to ensure that the warring forces comply with the ceasefire agreement.

The Agreement on the Cessation of Hostilities by the military and the MILF was signed in 1998 and reaffirmed through an interim agreement in 2001 by both parties.

However, it has been violated through either major or minor offensives and counter-offensives in the provinces of Davao Oriental, North Cotabato, Maguindanao, Sultan Kudarat and Zamboanga Sibugay.

Banzali said young people would join other sectors in their communities in calling for adherence to the truce.

Thus, he said, would ensure that violence, which tends to catch innocent civilians in the crossfire, would not erupt.

Jun Mantawil, head of the MILF negotiating panel secretariat, said during talks with the participants that ceasefire agreements "are always the hardest to follow" in any peace negotiations anywhere in the world.

But Mantawil expressed optimism that with the coming of the Malaysian-led International Monitoring Team, the agreement would be strictly observed.

Aside from wanting a greater role in the peace process, the youths also urged the negotiating parties to "be more transparent on the peace process and agreements reached."

Transparency, they said, could be achieved through the conduct of updates and dialogues with communities including the young people.

The youths also listed several other agenda that they want the government to attend to, including a review of school curriculum to correct what they considered the lack of a true historical account of Mindanao.

Noel Maningula, a youth leader from the Teduray Lambangian tribal youth and students association in Maguindanao, said the existing education curriculum has not helped preserve indigenous culture. PDI Mindanao Bureau

Silica mining operation suspended over run-offs

By Romy G. Amarado
PDI Visayas Bureau

DUMAGUETE CITY—The Mines and Geosciences Bureau of the Department of Environment and Natural Resources in Central Visayas suspended the operation of a mining firm in Ayungon, a town some 78 km north of here, for environment destruction.

Roger A. De Dios, officer in charge of the bureau, ordered on Oct. 13 a stop to the silica mining operation of the Looc Lead Ores Inc. (LLOI).

The bureau asked the firm to build six ponds and prevent leaks of mining wastes.

De Dios also ordered the LLOI to finalize a memorandum of agreement for the creation of the Mines Rehabilitation Fund Committee and the establishment of an Initial Rehabilitation Cash Fund in the amount of P150,000 and the P50,000 Monitoring Trust Fund to be deposited in a government depository bank.

De Dios' order was based on the recommendation of the multiparty monitoring team, which conducted its third quarter monitoring activity of the LLOI on Sept. 1.

Ayungon Mayor Edsel Enardecido said he also recommended the suspension of the operation of LLOI because the firm's operation poses a great risk to rice farms of the town's Barangay Banban, which is one of the major rice producing villages in the province.

Earlier, some 108 farmers led by Vicente Luang filed a complaint with the DENR claiming that some 30 to 40 hectares of rice land in Banban were covered by residues and other mining wastes from the LLOI.

According to the complaint, Dugan started his silica mining activity in Banban sometime in 2001.

The complaining farmers said the area affected was "gradually increasing, depriving any vegetation to grow (sic) on the covered areas and portions of the irrigation canal have been destroyed."

"If this will go on unsolved it is estimated that about 500 hectares will be covered by the mining wastes," the farmers warned.

In an answer to the complaint, Moises Philip V. Siangco, vice president for operations of LLOI, said the petition was "driven and tainted with sinister ulterior motives—that is to have a leverage against the move of the company to develop its property."

Siangco said "a lot of the petitioners are squatters on the company's 17-hectare titled property which the company intends to get, use and develop as buffer zone to augment the mine operation's mitigating measures ... and more importantly to implement a solid and stable environmental control for the operation to protect other areas in case of fortuitous events."

Siangco said the petitioners have "capitalized on the isolated incident way back in 2001" where mine

run-offs cascaded

down to some rice

areas that also destroyed the company's property, due to the

mining contractors.

Abra tribe continues traditional mourning rituals

By Artha Kira Paredes
PDI Northern Luzon Bureau

LAGAYAN, Abra—Despite modernization, Tingguans of Abra practice the tribe's traditions in honoring the dead.

Alfredo Mabanag, president of the Tingguian Inland Council Association of Cordillera, said when the dead is embalmed and placed in a coffin, the Inland (lowland Tingguians) follow rituals.

The dead's relatives, while garbed in white, sing traditional songs based on their culture through the practice called inangaga.

The bereaved family members wear longdo or a bandana so they will be distinguished from the rest of the mourners.

Since traditional garments are now scarce, any white cloth is used as a substitute, Mabanag said.

During a wake, white ribbons and white crepe paper are used as sash for immediate male family members and as belts for females.

In expressing their condolences to a family and in trying to comfort those in mourning, the Inland practice the sangsangit, git, where one chants how much loss the family member's death has brought, Mabanag said.

Iningngalan is another chant where one describes the dead's educational attainment, disposition and family.

Punishment

In trying to ease the pain of relatives present during the wake, singsakupan is done. One teaches the audience a song that they follow. Whoever fails to go along is punished by asking him or her to perform a task or do a sangsangit.

The whole time during the wake, the banglig, or the practice of passing on baw (sugarcane wine) to visitors, continues.

On the night before the burial, the elders stay awake until morning when the dead is taken to his or her final resting place.

The palpalabas and pakpakada are the Tingguian versions of an eulogy, but these are not done in church but at the house of the dead before he or she is buried.

Pakpakada in Ilocano means saying goodbye. Someone who knows the dead well will represent him, bid his family members farewell and relay his final words through a sangsangit.

Philip Tingonong, provincial planning and development officer, said the sangsangit is a generic term for solemn Tingguian chants appropriate for wakes.

"They (participants) are more like actors and actresses on Broadway, especially that they express the common sentiments through songs or by chanting the sangsangit," Tingonong said.

In palpalabas (letting go), someone will represent the widow or widower to give a reply to the pakpakada. There will also be representatives of other relatives, visitors and members of the community.

After the pakpakada and palpalabas, the panagdayaw ken pakamang, is observed.

Tingonong described this ritual as one of the "best features" in the set of death rituals.

Offering

The ritual involved relatives, up to the fifth degree, offering food, wine or money to the bereaved family.

"Traditionally, they give food (parapat) and drinks (baw), but for practical reasons, relatives tend to give money in envelopes," Tingonong said.

During burial, mourners are given bamboo sticks, called saplit, to drive away bad spirits.

Two black pigs are butchered, one at the house of the dead and another one at the cemetery. This practice is called the namumbunan.

Pig blood is sprinkled at the final resting place of the dead to appease the bad spirits, Tingonong said.

After the burial, when mourners return to the house of the bereaved family, the pig blood is mixed with coconut oil and applied at the forehead of relatives. Leaves called pagsenga are used to apply the blood and oil in the relatives' feet.

After this, the white mourning clothes are removed and they dance the tadek. This ritual is called agwagwag because they try to shake off the grief brought about by mourning.

The liver of the pig is read for signs and is used for predictions for things to come in the family and community.

A day after the burial, an arang (offering) is made at the shaded corners outside the house.

NLEX rates OKd by FVR, not GMA, board told

CITY OF SAN FERNANDO—The Manila North Luzon Tollways Corp. (MNTC) clarified on Wednesday that it was former President Fidel Ramos, not President Macapagal-Arroyo, who approved the agreement that increased toll rates along the North Luzon Expressway (NLEX) by 600 to 700 percent.

During an en banc provincial board hearing on the impending NLEX toll rates, Marlene Ochoa, MNTC assistant vice president for public information and external relations, told Vice Gov. Joselito Guiao and the board members here that Ramos approved the Supplemental Toll Operation Agreement (Stoa) in June 1998. The provincial officials said they thought it was Ms. Arroyo who approved the agreement.

Ochoa, however, said former President Joseph Estrada and Ms.

Arroyo knew about the Stoa and did not object to it. She said the Department of Justice reviewed the agreement in 2000 and in 2002 and found it to be "legally sound and enforceable."

The Stoa, signed by the MNTC and the Philippine government through the Toll Regulatory Board in April 1998, originally authorized the MNTC to collect only 82 centavos per kilometer from cars, jeeps, vans and other light vehicles. But MNTC officials led by its president, Jose de Jesus, said the 82 centavos per km had risen to P2.49 per km because of the peso depreciation against the US dollar and inflation rates since 1998.

Before Christmas this year, the MNTC would start charging a fixed rate of P42 for all types of vehicles from Balintawak to Bocaue, Bulacan, and P2.49 per km for small vehicles from Bocaue to Mabalacat, Pampanga.

Light trucks and buses would have to pay P6.23 per km while heavy trucks and trailers P7.47 per km. For the entire stretch of the 84-km NLEX from Mabalacat, Pampanga to Balintawak in Quezon City, small vehicles would be charged about P200 one-way toll, buses and light trucks some P523, and heavy trucks and trailers, P627.

The original toll rate along the NLEX was 33 centavos per km but the government-owned Philippine National Construction Corp., which operates the expressway, adjusted the rate to 52 centavos per km on July 15.

Board Member Tara Halili said the Stoa was used by the MNTC to secure loans from Asian Development Bank and other international lending institutions.

RAMOS

Guiao said the provincial board would invite representatives of the TRB, "if it is necessary," before the board comes out with a position and plans of action on the impending toll rate adjustments. Jun Maig, PDI Central Luzon Desk

PAMPANGA CAPITAL FIRE

Building owners, 36 execs face raps

CITY OF SAN FERNANDO—A panel investigating the Oct. 2 fire that killed eight workers of a supermarket here recommended on Friday the filing of criminal cases against the establishment's owners and the filing of administrative charges against 36 fire officials and personnel.

The panel, chaired by city legal officer Cecil Andin, found Tony and Marichu Choi, owners of the Popong's Suerte Mart, liable for reckless imprudence with multiple homicide.

In a report released on Friday, it said the owners "refused to correct and address the violations" of the fire safety code despite repeated warnings by the Bureau of Fire Protection.

Chief Insp. Johnny Caronan, this city's former fire marshal, was administratively liable because he issued a fire safety certificate to the supermarket despite violations of the Fire Code.

The panel said Supt. Emmanuel Arrozal, provincial fire marshal, and Chief Insp. Mario Racadio, the current fire marshal, as well as 33 firemen committed "neglect in the performance of their duties."

"They failed to at least exert efforts to attempt the rescue of the trapped victims," the panel said.

Mayor Oscar Rodriguez upheld the findings of the panel and ordered Andin, in coordination with the Philippine National Police, to file the charges on behalf of the victims.

They were trapped and charred to death on the fourth floor, which was illegally built.

The panel found former Mayor Reynaldo Aquino, now a Pampanga representative, not liable in what has been so far this capital's deadly fire.

City Administrator Per Caylao said Aquino issued the mayor's permit based on a clearance signed by Caronan. The city government, he said, was not furnished reports by the BFP.

Rodriguez said he has "personal reservations" with the findings.

Asked what these were, he cited Aquino's role in setting up the Business One-Stop Shop that enabled the Chois to obtain a permit without compliance with Fire Code provisions.

The fourth floor had no fire exit and escape ladders. Its windows were padlocked and covered with metal grills.

City Engr. Fiorello Gopez was not held liable because he did not issue an occupancy permit to the supermarket owners.

Rodriguez on Friday also suspended the operations of the one-stop shop. Only the documents of business establishments that have complied with health, sanitary, fire and tax requirements will be processed, he said.

The panel, also comprised of Caylao, human resource officer Sonia Soto, engineer Renato Santos and Councilors Reden Halili, Alex Patio and Ruperto Dumlaog, described the probe as "exhaustive."

Andin said the city government was pressing charges although the Chois continue to seek an out-of-court settlement with the families of the victims. Tonette Orejas, PDI Central Luzon Desk

Quezon folk protest rampant quarrying

LUCENA CITY—About 7,000 protesters denounced the rampant quarrying in Quezon province and the continuous destruction of Mt. Banahaw, during a rally here Tuesday.

In a program held in front of the governor's office, the protesters led by Quezon Representatives Rafael Nantes and Proceso Alcala padlocked the office of the Provincial Mining and Regulatory Board to symbolize their disgust over the board's bad performance.

"The rampant quarry operations around Mt. Banahaw must stop. The quarry operators are blatantly destroying a fragile mountain, which needs complete protection and rehabilitation," Nantes said.

Several craters measuring several hundred square meters and at least six meters deep dot Sanaya town, the main source of aggregates for Metro Manila and Southern Tagalog since the construction boom began in the 1980s.

Sariaya government records showed that in 1995, 57 quarry permits were issued.

Sariaya Mayor Connie Doromal said she was shocked when she first saw the extent of the quarry operations in her town. "We're now in the thick of investigation of all quarry operations in our locality," she told the INQUIRER.

The Lagnas Bridge in Sariaya collapsed at the height of typhoon "Rosang" in 1995 due to the strong current of the heavily mined river coming from the denuded portion of Mt. Banahaw.

The river current loosened the base of the bridge's foundation.

Two other towns, Tiaong and Dolores, also host several quarry operations.

Pr. Raul Enriquez, chair of the Kapatiran at Ayansang Aay para sa Kaunlaran ng Bayan or Kaakbay-Quezon, which spearheaded the rally, appealed to all provincial board members to heed the people's call against quarry oper-

"If the Sangguniang Panlalawigan will still not act, the people will put the matter into their hands," Enriquez said in a speech before the Quezon board.

Environment Secretary Michael Defensor has ordered a moratorium on all applications for environmental compliance certificate involving sand and gravel quarry operations in Quezon.

In a faxed statement to Tanggol Kalikasan-Southern Tagalog on Tuesday, Defensor said he received alarming reports that sand and gravel extraction had been proceeding with reckless abandon.

"In some areas, even mountains disappear..." Defensor said. Delfin T. Mallari Jr., PDI Southern Luzon Bureau

300 workers say traders stole their machines

SAN PEDRO, Laguna—Over 300 displaced workers of an American firm that closed shop last year accused the owners of a construction company here of stealing machinery that they said have been awarded to them in lieu of their unpaid salaries.

The machines, worth about P100 million, were used for the production of hooks and eyes for brassieres.

Eldido Cabrera, representative of former managers and supervisors of Stayfast Phils. Inc. (SPI), accused sisters Rhoda Filipina-Baayot and Rachel Filipina-Baayot of stealing the machines from the buildings that their company rented in Barangay Landayan on Oct. 8.

The buildings belong to the Filipinas, who also own the Filipina Construction Corp. (FCC), one of the biggest construction firms in Laguna.

But the sisters said the Cabrera group does not own the machines.

In a letter sent to the INQUIRER, the sisters said that as the owner of the rented buildings, FCC has the right to dispose of the properties left by SPI to offset the debt that the company owed them.

Cabrera said residents near their former factory saw several unidentified men using two 10-wheel trucks haul the equipment from the buildings without their consent.

Cabrera said their problems started when SPI, the world's biggest producer of hook-and-eye fasteners, stopped operations in July 2003 after supposedly suffering from huge losses.

Its owner, American businessman Joseph Santarasi Jr., failed to pay the employees their benefits, including separation pay and back wages.

In its June 11 decision, the National Labor Relations Commission (NLRC) ordered the SPI to award the company's properties to Cabrera's group, composed of 98 former managers and supervisors and 224 rank-and-file workers, as payment for their wages and other benefits.

Documents from the NLRC showed that the company owed the workers some P70 million.

The Filipina sisters said in their letter that since SPI closed shop in 2003, the management and officers of the company "very suddenly disappeared and abandoned the leased premises."

Since then SPI had failed to pay rent amounting to million of pesos, they said in the letter.

The letter said under the contract they had with SPI, "all properties and equipment left at the leased premises are answerable for SPI's obligations to [us]."

Cops raid Zambo City house, seize fake dollars, drugs

ZAMBOANGA CITY—Police authorities here on Friday evening seized close to P800,000 in suspected fake dollar bills and at least five large sachets of shabu from a father and son during a buy-bust operation.

The suspects, who were also arrested, were carrying identification cards supposedly issued by the Criminal Detection and Investigation Group.

Western Area Police commander

Chief Supt. Vidal Querol said they were still trying to determine if the dollar bills, with a total amount of $13,500, were counterfeit or not.

He said the police were also verifying if the ID cards were authentic or fake.

Authenticity check

Querol said the police would be requesting the Central Bank and the US government to help them verify the authenticity of the seized money.

Senior Supt. Mario Yanga, city police chief, identified the suspects as Majid Sahiban, a former police officer, and his son Muhaimin.

Yanga said they have been monitoring the suspects for the past days and on Friday evening, police decided to launch a buy-bust operation.

He said around 6 p.m., members of the Zamboanga City Anti-Illegal Drug Special Operation Task Force barged into the Sahibans' house in Barangay Bauwasan Gusu. The Sahibans did not resist arrest.

Aside from the drugs and the suspected counterfeit dollars, Yanga said the team was able to recover a 45 cal. pistol with live ammunition.

Querol said the two would initially be charged with illegal possession of firearm and selling of prohibited drugs. Julie S. Alipala, PDI Mindanao Bureau

Reyes says better LGU governance GMA agenda

CAGAYAN DE ORO CITY—Local Government Secretary Angelo Reyes Thursday led local government officials from Regions 9, 10 and 13 in launching the Governance Exposition 2004 here.

The city was picked as one of the four sites for the program's launching.

The program, funded by the Local Government Support Program (LGSP), aims to provide an opportunity for local government units (LGUs) to showcase their exemplary and replicable practices, innovations, tools and technologies, according to Reyes.

The LGSP is one of the largest foreign-funded development programs in the country working directly with LGUs in support of the country's decentralization efforts.

It is a P1 billion, four-year project funded by the Canadian International Development Agency.

Reyes said the program complements and advances President Macapagal-Arroyo's 10-point agenda.

"This is aimed at providing the local government level to build capabilities for governance..." Reyes said during the opening ceremonies of the program here.

At a press conference later, Reyes said under the program, LGUs would be able to determine their capabilities to deliver essential services. Grace C. Albasin, PDI Mindanao Bureau

Cholera cases, deaths alarm health execs in Negros Occidental

By Carla P. Gomez
PDI Visayas Bureau

BACOLOD CITY—Health officials in Negros Occidental have raised alarm over 11 cholera cases recorded at a government hospital here since September.

Even just one case of cholera could already be considered an "outbreak," according to Dr. Erib-erto Layda, head of the department of pathology of the Corazon Locsin Montelibano Memorial Regional Hospital (CLMMRH) here.

"Anything communicable is alarming because it will jeopardize the health of the community," he said.

Layda said that in the last three years, the CLMMRH had no cholera cases, until September this year.

Out of 80 patients admitted at the CLMMRH for gastroenteritis over the last two months—21 in September and 59 in October—26 of them had stool examinations and 11 were found positive for vibrio cholerae, he said.

Of the 80 patients suffering from dehydration, 13 had died, and Dr. Benito Bionat, CLMMRH chief of clinics, said it was possible that some of them were suffering from cholera.

Most of the 80 patients are from Bacolod City.

Dr. Luisa Efrén, provincial health officer, said that of the 11 confirmed cholera cases, nine were from Bacolod and one each from the cities of Victorias and Bago.

She said their investigation showed that the patient from Bago who acquired cholera had eaten contaminated food in Punta Taytay, Bacolod.

Dr. Jovy Vergara of the Bacolod City Health Office said CHO has been conducting sanitary inspections and epidemiological tests to determine the source of contamination in Bacolod City.

He said they were doing this to determine the sources of the contaminated water to stop the disease from spreading.

Symptoms of cholera are profuse vomiting and diarrhea, causing rapid dehydration that could lead to organ failure and death if not treated immediately, Layda said.

War of the fruits in T'boli land

By Aquiles Z. Zonia
T'boli, South Cotabato

THE T'BOLI people are caught in a tug-of-war between two groups desperately wanting to exploit the natural bounty of their ancestral land in South Cotabato.

Two local cooperatives want to plant pineapple in the area, but another group, an outsider, prefers banana.

The natives are confused. Only a few of them have acquired formal schooling, and there are fears that the communities could be tricked or easily swayed to lease their land for a pittance.

Even those the tribespeople regard as leaders—experienced and educated—are divided. And they are in a quandary as to where to go for help.

Overlapping

Before planting pineapple in about 5,000 hectares of land, mostly owned by the natives, the Lamonon Multi-Purpose Cooperative (LMPC) and the T'boli Multi-Fruit Growers Cooperative (TMFGC) went through the tedious process of acquiring an environmental compliance certificate (ECC).

The farmers' co-ops are beneficiaries of the government's land reform program. They have a combined membership of 443, most of them lumad (indigenous people).

They have been contracted to grow pineapple by Dole Philippines (Dolefil), which serves as their technical and marketing partner, under a project funded by loans from the Land Bank of the Philippines.

The pineapple project covers 13 of T'boli town's 25 barangays, and the co-ops intend to expand their plantation by about 5,000 more hectares in the next five years.

The project had barely started when Upland Banana Corp. (UBC), a subsidiary of the AMS Group of Companies, came in, looking for an area to develop into a banana plantation. UBC plans to pour in P45 million in investments to the 5,000-hectare site.

The idea drew strong opposition from the pineapple growers. In April, the co-ops passed a joint resolution asking then Environment Secretary Elsiea Gozun to stop the entry of UBC, particularly in areas identified as sites for the pineapple project.

Pacific Cordada, LMPC chair, said the areas would overlap with the co-ops' pineapple fields in eight barangays. He feared that chemicals used in the banana plantation, which would be adjacent to areas planted with pineapple, could contaminate the co-ops' produce, resulting in their outright rejection by buyers in the market.

Not environment-friendly

He claimed that the land canvassing, establishment of a nursery, and the lease contract executed by UBC officials without clearance from the Protected Area Management Board and an ECC were a clear mockery of the law.

The allegations were confirmed by a DENR team directed by Jim Sampulna, DENR director for Central Mindanao, which investigated the complaint aired by the co-ops against UBC in a memorandum dated May 13, 2004.

In its inspection report dated June 8, the team recommended that UBC first secure an ECC before starting any activity. It further noted that six of the eight barangays covered by the banana plantation were within the Allah Valley Protected Landscape.

UBC got the PAMB clearance only on July 27, long after it had started field operations.

Officials and members of the cooperatives fear that the banana plantation, aside from destroying their existing pineapple growing project, will result in pollution and other adverse ecological consequences, and displace residents in the affected areas.

"Who will pay for the damages to our project, including bank loans?" Cordada asked.

A banana plantation, one co-op official said, required a huge volume of water. Providing this need may dry up the water supply to lowlanders, especially farmers, in the towns of Surallah, Banga, Sto. Niño and Norala. These localities depend on the Gau River as source of potable water and irrigation.

Noel Venus, manager for ownership and land reform of the AMS Group of Companies, allayed the fears of the co-ops, saying no one would be displaced and that protecting the environment was their main concern.

Residents will be given preference in the hiring of workers, Venus said. The company, he added, would undertake mitigating measures to preserve and protect the environment.

The official said the banana growing project had the written approval of the tribal chieftains of the eight barangays.

Benefits for whom?

Adolfo Tanco Jr., a member of the board of directors of TMFGC, claimed that the majority, if not all, of the members of the cooperatives had already mortgaged their land to big traders in the town.

Tanco, himself a T'boli, said that to emancipate his fellow lumad from the clutches of these traders, the co-ops launched the so-called Land Redemption Program.

Land mortgaged by the natives to the traders would be redeemed by the co-ops under the program. The co-ops and the landowners would then enter into a lease agreement allowing the redeemed land to be converted into a pineapple plantation.

The landowners are also given priority in hiring workers for the project. "Aside from having the chance of getting back their land, the natives are provided employment while earning from rentals paid by the co-ops," Tanco said.

The co-ops are paying P25,000 per hectare of land per cycle (3.5 years) to the landowners as rental. On the other hand, the UBC rental rate is P10,000 per hectare per year, over a period of 25 years.

Tanco said the UBC rental scheme was not only unjust but would also displace the lumad from their ancestral lands.

Coerced

Cordada claimed that about 30

natives who were parties to the lease contract with UBC had already decided to back out.

An owner of a 3.5-hectare piece of property said that when he decided to renounce the contract he had signed, the company threatened to file a case against him. "I am 33 years old. By the time I get hold of my land [under the UBC contract], I would already be 58," Mario Kingil said in Ilonggo.

Manuel Dualan, 35, who owns a 2.5-hectare lot, said he also signed a lease contract with UBC. He said he realized that he would be receiving only a morsel from UBC after visiting Lapanday Global Fruits in Tampakan town in South Cotabato.

The landowners in Tampakan receive P30,000 per hectare as yearly rental. The contract, for which they got P10,000 as a signing bonus, will last for just six years.

Dualan said they were not aware that the contract with UBC would expire only after 25 long years. No representative from the National Commission on Indigenous Peoples was present during the contract signing, he added.

After he decided to back out, Dualan said UBC refused to take back the P6,000 advanced rental he had received.

The company, he said, filed a complaint before the barangay court against him, but he added that he was not even aware of its nature.

He is unfazed. "I am willing to go to jail if [that's what] they want, but I stand by my principles."

Dualan said he was just as dismayed when a tribal leader came to convince him not to withdraw from UBC. The tribal leader, who is also a village chieftain in Dualan's area, reportedly serves as a land canvasser for UBC and receives P1,000 per hectare as commission.

THE ENTRY of big capitalists in their homeland had put the T'boli people in a quandary over pineapples and bananas.

US television news channels broke into their programs to show the al-Qaida leader's ominous message to the American people.

Drop-off at TV station

Al-Jazeera said Saturday that it received the Bin Laden message at its offices in the Pakistani capital of Islamabad.

The tape was dropped off at the gate of the station's office in an envelope on Friday, just hours before it aired, said Ahmad Muhsen Zaidan, Al-Jazeera's bureau chief in Pakistan.

"We received it in Pakistan ... Somebody dropped it yesterday at the gate," Zaidan said. "The guard brought it to me along with other mail. It was in an envelope, I opened it and it was a big scoop."

Zaidan said he immediately transmitted the tape to Al-Jazeera's headquarters in the Gulf nation of Qatar.

Bin Laden and his top deputy, Egyptian surgeon Ayman al-Zawahiri, are both believed to be hiding in the mountains that straddle the Afghan-Pakistan border, although there has been no hard evidence of their whereabouts for more than three years.

Zaidan said the fact the tape was received by the station in Pakistan did not necessarily mean that Bin Laden and al-Zawahiri were in the area.

Bush sharpened his attacks on rival Kerry after vowing that Bin

'Shameful'

Not quite two hours after reaching out to Kerry in his first public remarks on the message, Bush said the Democrat's charge that bad strategy let Bin Laden escape US forces in late 2001 was "especially shameful."

"Unfortunately my opponent tonight continued to say things he knows are not true, accusing our military of passing up a chance to get Osama bin Laden at Tora Bora," an Afghan stronghold, in 2001, the Republican president told cheering supporters in Ohio.

"As the commander in charge of that operation, (retired general) Tommy Franks has said: It's simply not the case," Bush said. "It is especially shameful in the light of a new tape from America's enemy."

Kerry appeared uncertain about how to respond to Bin Laden's bombshell appearance after his initial comments sparked a firestorm within the Bush campaign.

In a television interview that marked the first response to the tape from either candidate, Kerry vowed to hunt down and kill terrorists, and said America was united in that desire.

Then, repeating a motif from his stump speeches he said, "I regret that when George Bush had the opportunity in Afghanistan at Tora Bora, he didn't use our forces to hunt down and kill Osama bin Laden. He outsourced to the war lords."

Inappropriate

Bush aides argued that the line was inappropriate in light of the Bin Laden tape.

Speaking to reporters in Ohio, White House communications director Dan Bartlett said Kerry should have frozen his criticisms for 12 hours.

"You would think that there would be a, maybe, 12 hours to let the Americans absorb what has just happened today," he said.

Prodded on why Kerry should have stopped criticizing the president, Bartlett revised his statement, saying that the problem was that Kerry's attack had been "discredited."

Kerry appeared to heed the call, steering well clear of the accusation in his next rally in Miami, vowing only to make America safer than Bush had, after delivering a terse statement in front of his campaign jet on the tarmac of a Florida airport.

"In response to this tape of Osama bin Laden, let me just make it clear, crystal clear: as Americans we are united in our determination to hunt down and destroy Osama bin Laden and the terrorists," Kerry said.

"They are barbarians. I will stop at absolutely nothing to hunt down, capture or kill the terrorists wherever they are, whatever it takes," he said.

Arnold in Ohio

Bush on Friday enlisted Hollywood action star turned California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger to stump for him in Ohio, a critical up-for-grabs state, where the candidates are neck-and-neck.

"Now is the time to flex your muscles for bold leadership, for a strong economy," the former bodybuilding superstar said. "If you flex your muscles November 2nd, I guarantee you: President Bush will be back."

Earlier, Bush had insisted that the tape—in which Bin Laden mocked the president who once vowed to catch him "dead or alive"—would not affect the election.

"Let me make this very clear. Americans will not be intimidated or influenced by an enemy of our country," Bush said in a hastily arranged statement on an airport tarmac in Toledo, Ohio.

"I'm sure Senator Kerry agrees with this," he added. "I also want to say to the American people that we are at war with these terrorists, and I am confident that we will prevail." AFP New York Times News Service, AP Lawmaker wants to hike taxes ...

20 percent excise tax on luxury goods and services ranging from perfumes and yachts to cosmetic and body enhancement procedures.

"Given the current fiscal crisis, the government needs a more creative way of increasing its tax base which will not be detrimental to the needy sectors of society," Mitra said in House Bill No. 2831.

HB 2831 targets perfumes, yachts and "other vessels intended for pleasure and sports."

It includes "other goods with any of the following qualities: antique, rare, handmade by artisans, made of expensive metals or of exquisite design, custom-made or with exceptional features, and created by well-known persons/company."

The bill covers cosmetic and body enhancement procedures like liposuction, breast enlargement, hair removal and the like.

Anticipating howls of protest from people who may want a nip-tuck, or perhaps a booty like J. Lo's, Mitra argued that taxing these goods and services would "enhance the progressivity of the tax system because the tax burden is borne by those who are able to pay."

nal goods and services was not limited to the Philippines.

"All over the world today, the tax base is being redefined, broadened and enlarged to capture the ever-changing behavior and lifestyle of people in businesses and government," Mitra said.

He noted that cosmetic enhancement services tax, latte tax (a levy on designer coffee drinks), political posters or billboards tax were "already being considered globally."

The Mitra bill seeks to empower the Department of Finance to come up with a complete listing of non-essential goods and services subject to excise tax.

"The list shall be reviewed and revised annually," he said.

On non-essential goods, the bill provides for a 20 percent tax on the wholesale price or value of importation.

Non-essential services will be levied a tax equivalent to 20 percent of gross receipts.

Exemptions

In a statement, Mitra clarified that the bill would exempt certain cosmetic procedures needed to "remedy disfigurement caused by accidents like fire, vehicular mishaps or violent acts such as lacerations."

Also exempted are procedures for life-threatening cases like the removal of cancerous warts.

"(Surgery for) harelips are not covered (by the tax) but hair transplants are, even if a person insisted that he would die of shame for being bald," Mitra said.

"We repeat about everything here. I hire my own personnel, do my purchasing worldwide for importation of raw materials," he said.

Neese makes daily rounds to ensure that the graves and the memorials are well-tended and the surroundings spot and span. Some of the problems include installing a water supply system for the plants, termite attacks on the trees, urban air pollution which causes markers to deteriorate, and putting out the occasional grass fire.

About the worst problem that he has had to deal with are the typhoons. The strong winds would often break tree branches, if not topple the trees entirely, and damage some grave markers.

Busiest job

But having dealt successfully with such problems, he can afford to joke about his job: "Doing nothing is the busiest job in the world."

He gave a shudder and knocked on wood when asked if there had been instances of vandalism. Recently, Muslim militants vandalized the graves of British soldiers from World War II in Gaza, Palestine.

Neese and his staff also arrange ceremonies for visiting US citizens and military dignitaries during Veterans Day and Memorial Day, set visiting schedules for tourists and relatives of those buried there, and answer letters and e-mailed inquiries from around the world.

For friends and relatives of the dead, the staff provides free services such as locating the plots, giving travel information and finding nearby accommodations.

They also offer photographs of headstones and engravings, and arrange for floral decorations to be placed on the graves and memorial sites.

Neese said not many families have had the chance to visit their dead who are buried here because of distance and the high cost of traveling from the US.

The missing

The cemetery also memorializes 35,282 missing whose names are inscribed in the large memorial located at the center of the cemetery, as well as those "who sleep in unknown graves."

Neese played host recently to a group of forensic scientists from Hawaii who are trying to identify the more than 3,700 "unknown soldiers" who are buried in the cemetery. The group has so far identified four.

How he got the job

The superintendent recalled how he wanted to be a park ranger when he was a boy. After his Army discharge, he worked for a private firm. In 1989, he stumbled on an ad of the American Battle Monuments Commission, the US federal agency in charge of constructing and maintaining memorial shrines and military monuments and markers in foreign countries.

"It piqued my curiosity, especially its mission, taking care of America's war dead overseas," he said.

Assignments

His first assignment was at the small US military cemetery in the village of Hamm in Luxembourg, which had 8,000 graves. He later served as caretaker in American cemeteries in Normandy in France, Belgium and the Netherlands. He was posted to the Philippines in May 2002.

Neese is also in charge of WWII battle monuments in Saipan, Northern Marianas; Port Moresby, Papua New Guinea; Guadalcanal, Solomon Islands; and Cabanatuan City in Nueva Ecija, Philippines.

The Nueva Ecija monument features a "wall of honor" memorializing the site of a prisoner-of-war camp where 3,000 US soldiers died while in captivity.

Biggest number of US soldiers

The Manila cemetery is only the second largest in area of the cemeteries memorializing the service of US soldiers overseas. But it has the biggest number of soldiers interred and memorialized.

The cemetery lies on a prominent plateau, visible from a distance. The gently rising ground, covered with tropical trees and shrubbery, culminates in the central memorial.

Most of the buried and memorialized soldiers lost their lives in the epic defense of the Philippines and the Far East in 1941 and 1942 and in the victorious return of the US forces through the vast Pacific island chain.

The Philippine government authorized the establishment of the memorial in April 1948 in the former US military reservation known as Fort William McKinley. Designed by Gardner A. Dailey, it was completed in 1960.

Neese said his mission is to ensure that the cemetery maintains and meets the highest standards as a living memorial to fallen soldiers overseas whose families had entrusted the care of their loved ones to its caretakers.

'They deserve no less'

"It's keeping the memory of the valor and sacrifice that was paid by these men and women. That's why our standards are so high. Not because the public deserves to see a nice place but these soldiers who are interred here deserve nothing but the best," he said.

He said he often gets asked by visitors, particularly young people, if there are ghost stories that he could share.

"I've never experienced anything paranormal. I always say you never have to fear the dead. It's always the living you have to fear," he said.

Tourist destination

The American cemetery is listed in the tourism department's list of main attractions in Makati. Neese said 84,000 people visited the cemetery last year, mostly from Japan, China and other Asian countries.

"We do get lots of Filipinos. But it's not No. 1 on their list [of tourist spots] to visit a cemetery. I think it has something to do with the culture," he said while also noting that Filipinos customarily troop to the cemeteries on All Saints Day to pay their respects to the dead.

The cemetery is open daily to the public from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. seven days a week and no special passes are required.

BALINESE ROOF SHAKES

(Do you want an Asian design for your home?)

More homebuilders are now turning their eyes on designs that capture the natural beauty of the shores, hills and forests of Southeast Asia.

Some call this design Balinese, others Asian.

Muti-Line now has the roofing material quality for this design: MetroShake.

It's not tiles, for that would look Japanese or Mediterranean.

MetroShake simulates rough wood drawn from the depths of Asian forests and cut into roof shakes.

It's the next best thing to the natural thatched roof.

Made of zincalume steel in New Zealand, MetroShake is painted eight times, epoxy primed and ceramic granulated. It carries a warranty of 30 years.

That's something you would expect from a roofing that will survive the Asian hot sun, typhoons and howling roars of sea water by the shores.

METRO

LRT fare hike a must, says DOTC

By Clarissa S. Batino

METRO Manila's railway systems need a P10-fare hike badly, according to Secretary Leandro Mendoza of the Department of Transportation and Communication (DOTC).

He said the DOTC had endorsed the fare hike to the finance and budget departments.

These two departments must agree to the proposal before the National Economic and Development Authority, headed by President Macapagal-Arroyo, could approve the fare increase.

If it is any consolation, the Metro Rail Transit Line 3 (MRT-3) cut the proposed minimum fare to P16 from P17. Its current minimum fare stands at P9.50.

But the proposed fare hike from North Edsa to Baclaran remains at P10, which will raise the current fare from P15 to P25.

MRT-3 general manager Roberto Lastimosa said the government had hoped to implement the fare hike in August. The proposed increase in the fares of the MRT-3 as well as the Light Rail Transit (LRT) Lines 1 and 2 have been pending since March.

LRT-2 opened its Recto station for operations last Friday. The opening of the 11th station from Pasig should increase the passenger count daily to about 120,000 from the current volume of about 100,000.

The LRT-2 fare ranges from P12 to P15 while LRT-1 collects a flat rate of P15.

Mendoza said the government was also balancing the need to raise revenue to sustain the operations of the railway with the capacity of commuters to absorb the fare increase.

Close to 800,000 commuters ride the MRT-3, LRT-1 and LRT-2 everyday.

"We have to consider the economics kasi kanina din ang mga tao (because people will have a hard time). But it would be very difficult to sustain the operations of the railway without the fare increase," said Mendoza.

The train authorities cited the increased costs of maintenance, particularly of the electricity that runs the train systems. Power accounts for about 30 percent of the railway system's operation expenses.

Income from operating the railway, according to government sources, is not enough to cover the costs of maintenance.

Lastimosa said the government had no other means of collecting additional income as a private consortium collected the earnings from advertisements within the MRT-3 premises.

Watchmen in Blanca case: Who is hiding?

By Canon B. Riba Jr.

NONE of the security guards in the murder case of actress Nida Blanca are in hiding.

"We have always been ready to cooperate in the investigation," lawyer Eldorado Lim, owner of the Northern Isabela Security Agency (NISA), said yesterday.

Lim called up the inquirer to belie reports that his three men—Roberto Cafete, Ricky (not Ricardo as earlier reported) Alvarez and Diolito Molines—were avoiding a new probe.

"No one called up the agency or asked about the guards before news that they had gone missing came out," Lim said, adding that he and the three watchmen had given their full cooperation from the start.

In fact, he added, had anyone called their office, he could have readily presented Alvarez, who still works for the agency.

Lim said Cafete and Molines did not renew their licenses as security guards, so they were no longer with NISA.

Cafete, he disclosed, was already working as a collector for Timbang Gravel and Sand in Tandang Sora, Quezon City.

According to Lim, Cafete has called him and expressed readiness to face a new probe.

Lim said he was not aware of the whereabouts of Molines but the security agency was already trying to locate him.

At the same time, Lim denounced reports linking his wife, Zenaida, a state prosecutor, to the operations of NISA.

"She is not connected with the security agency I own and operate it," he said.

3 more fires hit Metro

TWO WOMEN were injured in one of three fires that hit three cities of the metropolis yesterday.

Malabon arson investigators identified the victims as Florde-llyn Aquino, 45, and Editha Baldoza, 40, owner of a two-story house that burned down on Crispin Street, Barangay Tinajeros.

Some 50 families were rendered homeless in the three-hour blaze that started at 3 a.m.

In Parañaque, an overheated electric fan caused an hour-long fire at the Neighborhood Association Compound on Switzerland Street. Damage was placed at P200,000.

Earlier, on Friday evening, the MOD auto parts store at the corner of Gil Puyat and Tramo Street in Pasay City went up in flames and resulted in damages estimated at P500,000.

The causes of the fires in Malabon and Pasay were still being determined as of press time. Tina G. Santos and Nancy G. Carvajal

'CONDOS' FOR THE DEPARTED

The dead get better accommodations

and Tarra V. Quismundo

UNLIKE most people who will have to brave heavy traffic and elbow their way into crowded cemeteries, businesswoman Cnsty Samson, 40, and her family will probably just stay home tomorrow.

Her father died five years ago. His body was cremated after the wake and the ashes were placed in an urn.

In 2002, she bought a vault for her father's remains at a columbarium in Quezon City. A few days ago, she had the vault opened so she could take her father's remains and bring them home.

She plans to return the urn after All Saints Day.

Talk about evolving burial practices.

Boxes, vaults and niches

Instead of tombs, a columbarium has small boxes built on stone pillars. These boxes, called niches, hold the cremated remains of a person's cremated remains.

Millions of years ago in Europe, it is only now that Filipinos are burying their dead in columbaria.

The apprehension could be partly due to religion.

The Catholic Church had prohibited cremation until 1983.

Now, religious orders in the country are the pioneers in building columbaria, particularly in Metro Manila.

The Augustinian Fathers and a private developer now have The Columbarium in Quezon City, which houses 35,000 vaults. The project is almost 75 percent complete.

Vincentians, too

The Vincentian Fathers have also started the construction of the Santuario de San Vicente de Paul Shrine and Columbarium, also in Quezon City. It will have 9,000 niches.

Amid the fiscal crisis, developers present the columbarium as a practical alternative to traditional burial.

Or is it?

Urns used for keeping the ashes of those cremated cost P10,000 to P100,000.

At the same time, the price of a vault ranges from 25,000 to 90,000, depending on the location.

On the other hand, a vacant lot in a memorial garden and the construction of a tomb or a mausoleum will cost more than P100,000.

No fees, no renewals

There will be no monthly fees for maintenance, nor will there be a need to renew the contract, The Columbarium manager Liz Reyes said.

In public cemeteries, contracts last for only five years.

Reyes' company even offers vaults on an installment basis, ranging from P800 to P2,500 monthly, payable in three years.

According to her, this should disprove the idea that cremation and columbaria are only for rich families.

Aside from lower costs, maintaining vaults for relatives who have passed away is also more convenient, Samson said.

Unlike in cemeteries, columbaria usually have 24-hour security guards and custodians.

The vaults can also be opened from time to time, so family members can bring home their dearly departed's remains on special occasions.

And, because columbaria are usually constructed under churches or chapels, the dead are literally brought back to the house of their Creator, Santuario de San Vicente de Paul Shrine and Columbarium project director Fr. Atilano Fajardo said.

The use of the columbarium is not new in the country. Some priests during the Spanish times were cremated and their ashes kept under churches.

However, it was only recently that this practice was "commercialized," Fajardo said.

"I think in the next 10 years, (the columbarium) will be acceptable to (Filipinos)," he added.

More acceptance

There is also a growing number of Filipinos who prefer cremation to a traditional burial, developers of The Columbarium said in a study brief.

The developers said that in the next six years, 20 percent of Metro Manila residents will favor cremation.

But University of the Philippines anthropology department head Michael Tan believes the process of acceptance will be slow.

"There will be a lot of resistance," he said.

Tan said residents in congested cities might be open to cremation, but those in rural areas would cling to their traditional practices.

The belief in the resurrection of the body, as taught by the Church, will also make it difficult for some Filipinos to let the bodies of their loved ones be reduced to ashes.

Turning to the columbarium would also displace the culture of going to the cemeteries on All Saints' Day, a tradition many Filipinos may not be ready to abandon.

For those who may choose to retain the annual practice of visiting cemeteries, the city of Manila will soon be offering similar "accommodations" for the dead at the North Cemetery.

"Condominium-type" buildings for the departed are under construction on 4.6 hectares of the cemetery, a project that would take the commonly known "apartment" crypts to a higher level.

GETTING ready for the flood of people wishing to remember their dearly departed, Western Police District Chief Supt. Pedro Bulaong and National Capital Region Police Office Director Avelino Razon Jr. (above) oversee security at the entrance of the Manila North Green Park. struction on 4.6 hectares of the cemetery, a project that would take the commonly known "apartment" crypts to a higher level.

The Manila North Green Park is in the works inside the city-owned cemetery on the corner of Blumentritt and Andres Bonifacio Street in Sta. Cruz.

It will be a sprawling 130-building complex of multi-level crypts that may house ashes, skeletal remains or coffins.

Joint venture

A joint venture between the city government and private developer CHC Development Consortium, Inc., the project will be completed in five years during which 14 building clusters on 2.8 hectares will be built.

"The private sector would take care of the development and maintenance of the surroundings, in exchange for letting them use public land," said Mayor Lito Atienza.

The new burial facility shares the main entrance of the 54-hectare North Cemetery, whose gates were recently replaced to match the theme of the new multi-level memorial park.

The buildings would house 47,000 coffin crypts and 22,000 bone crypts—smaller ones that can hold up to four skeletons or ash urns.

Two clusters of three-story buildings, each level having five layers of crypts, will be built. The rest would rise to two stories, with a total of 10 crypt layers.

A main road would be carved around the building clusters and their parking lots. Walkways would be installed on each level of the crypt buildings, where families may offer candles and flowers to their departed loved ones.

On-site project manager Patrick Corpus said that the plan also covers sanitary concerns, as an underground sealed vault would be constructed to collect "cadaver juices" using a drainage path through the multi-level crypts.

How about the living?

The project began as families of the cemetery's thousands of residents sought the traditional last of their loved ones. The buildings would occupy the present site of the North Cemetery.

"What would happen to the workers? They have nowhere else to go, and they have been living there for a long time," said Chat Dimaano, spokesperson of Kalipunan ng Migranteng Pilipino at Pamilya (KMPP), which learned about the situation through some of their members who lived in the cemetery.

Dimaano said that while the families living there were indeed informal dwellers, they have considered the cemetery their homes for generations.

The militant group counted some 5,000 cemetery cleaners, informal cemetery workers and their families living in a portion of the public cemetery.

Relocation planned

"They were informed of the plan and given advance notice. But I don't think that would be a problem," said Corpus, confident that City Hall would take care of the informal dwellers.

Asked what would happen to the families that would eventually have to give way to the construction of multi-level crypts, Atienza said their relocation was being planned.

CHC began construction following a Memorandum of Agreement with City Hall, which allows them to undertake the project under a build-operate-transfer scheme.

The private firm aims to finish construction within three to five years, as they would have to turn over the facility to City Hall in between five to seven years.

"We are hoping to open crypts for interment by December or January," Corpus said.

Based on CHC's marketing leaflet, coffin crypts would be sold for P17,581.73 while bone crypts are priced at P12,765. Payments may be made in cash or on an installment basis.

Once the crypts are sold out, the 47,000 coffin crypts stand to yield P826 million, while the 22,000 bone crypts may rake in an income of P280 million.

Islamic prayer room withstands opposition Manila docs to give free hernia operations

By Luige A. del Puerto

CONSTRUCTION of the Islamic prayer room on the ground floor of a parking building at the Greenhills Shopping Center continues unabated despite continuing opposition from homeowners' associations in surrounding areas.

Muslim traders at the shopping center eagerly await the opening of their prayer room, or musallah, tentatively set for Nov. 10.

"Our information is that the prayer room will be opened on Nov. 10. If not, then before Nov. 14, the last day of the Ramadan," Rex Dimacuta, secretary-general of the Greenhills Muslim Traders Association, said over the phone.

Muslims celebrate the last day of the Ramadan, called Eid al-Adha, with a feast, and Ortigas and Co. intends that the celebration take place at the Muslims' new, air-conditioned prayer room, Dimacuta said.

"The Creator has allowed the construction to be finished soon, and we could only thank Him," Dimacuta said.

He said Ortigas and Co. had repeatedly assured Muslim traders that the construction of the prayer room would go on unhampered.

So far, people could see for themselves that work on the parking area, where the musallah is to be housed, continues, he said.

Nonetheless, opposition to the establishment of the prayer room has not died down.

The North Greenhills Association circulated a newsletter this week reiterating that the "main issue" in the controversy is peace and order—not religion.

The association is aggressively lobbying against the prayer room, arguing that wherever mosques are built, the area quickly deteriorates in terms of land value and security.

Yet on Tuesday night, some Greenhills residents virtually rebuked their association's inflexible stand on the issue.

At least 30 residents met in an "extraordinary meeting" to discuss and vote on four resolutions, according to Francisco Joaquin, former chair and president of the association.

While the residents did not meet to put forward a categorical statement of support for the prayer room, those who favor it have scored big psychologically.

On the surface, the move showed that residents are deeply divided on the issue, and a number have reservations about the association's stand on the controversy.

Joaquin supports the establishment of the prayer room and calls the association's stand as an act of "bigotry" and "religious intolerance."

The first three resolutions are summarized as follows:

• The Board of Directors may not represent members in matters of religious belief, including the Islamic prayer room controversy.

• The association may not use its funds in the filing of any case decided by the Board on a religious issue.

• An officer or member may speak on a religious issue only in his or her personal capacity, and not on behalf of residents.

AMID the rising prices of gasoline and other basic goods, some things still come free—even if only for a while.

The Ospital ng Maynila's Department of Surgery has announced that it will be operating on children with hernia for free in November.

Hernia, known locally as luslos, is a condition wherein part of the intestine bulges through a weak area of muscles in the abdomen.

The condition usually affects the groin area in males who experience a lump near their genitals. Dr. Red Roque, a senior resident at the Department of Surgery, said "Operation Luslos Ubus" aims to provide free and efficient medical service to patients.

"The project intends to deliver quality surgical care to indigent patients," he said in a statement sent to the INQUIRER.

The operation will be done in cooperation with the Give a Life Foundation.

Roque said that so far, six hernia patients are scheduled to avail of free surgery.

Those who wish to inquire about the project may contact Dr. Roque through the Ospital ng Maynila's Department of Surgery at 524-6061 loc. 103 or 300.

Air Phil 5 triumphs, shares top

By Jasmine W. Payo

JEROME Paterno took on the hero's role one more time.

Paterno, who shot the winning basket in Air Philippines' opening game victory, nailed another clutch jumper in the last 9.9 seconds as the Flight slipped past Granny Goose Torillos, 78-76, to grab a share of the lead in the PBL Open Championship yesterday at the La Salle Greenhills Gym.

"It was all heart and a lot of luck. Paterno is really a big time player," said coach Lawrence Chongson after the Flight joined defending champion Magnolia FEU in the top spot at 2-0.

Paolo Hubalde paced Air Philippines with 15 points.

In the second game, ICTSI-La Salle surprisingly had an easy time scoring its first win by blasting rival Addict Mobile-Ateneo, 81-57. Mac Cardona had a game-high 28 points, while Joseph Yeo added 20.

The Archers settled for a 1-1 card along with idle Toyota Otis-Letran and Montaña. Pre-season favorite Ateneo, together with last conference's finalist Welcoat, remain winless in two outings.

Air Philippines controlled the tempo for a 41-30 cushion at the interval. But Granny Goose's persistent rallies narrowed the margin to two, 76-74, less than two minutes remaining.

An underdog stab from Torillos' Alfie Grijaldo tied the contest, 76-76, at 31.5 seconds. But Paterno, who confidently positioned himself at the right flank, responded with the winning basket.

Cardona and Yeo teamed up early on to put ICTSI-La Salle ahead by 17 points, 53-36, in the third quarter. Junjun Cabatu continued the surge in the final canto, and another Cardona drive pushed the Archers ahead by 23 points, 69-46.

Tolentino, Unabia clinch Osaka 10-K

TWO JOURNEYMEN from Mindanao stunned the hometown crowd when they emerged champions of the elite 10-Kilometer Open division of the 5th Osaka-Guardo Anniversary Run yesterday.

Queen City International Run champion Aileen Tolentino of Cagayan de Oro and Arnold Unabia (31 minutes 11 seconds) of Tanguib City took contrasting routes to claim the championship trophy and the top purse of P5,000.

Tolentino was running breast to breast with Christy Sevileno of University of Cebu when the latter suffered stomach cramps and had to stop temporarily to recover her form in front of Cebu Normal University.

This paved the way for Tolentino and another Cebuana, Lezie Lu-minda-Gerarteles, to get the edge. Luminda-Gerarteles finished second for a prize of P3,000 and Sevileno, the defending champion, dropped to third place for P2,000.

An athletics coach of the Tanguib City Government, Unabia placed second to Bowen Montecillo in the same race in 2000. Yesterday, he extracted revenge as Montecillo dropped to third place with second-place honors going to Joseph Penales (32 mins 20 secs) of Bohol.

In the 5-km race, Xandertyn Lokoy of Saint Alphonsos College of Lapu-lapu City reaffirmed his dominance. A 3-gold winner in the recent Milo Little Olympics here at the Cebu City Sports Center, Lokoy was followed by Julius Pensenga and Michael Magpantoc.

Esguerra galloperes SLR Cup favorites

By Edwin Villanueva, Contributor

REVVED up by a runner-up finish a week ago, Neat Laurel teams up with Royal Catch when they try to capture the Sta. Lucia Realty Cup today at the Santa Ana Park.

The 1-2 Hermie Esguerra punch are expected to go up as top picks mainly because of their contrasting running styles that could give their rivals a lot of headache in the 1,600-meter trip.

Royal Catch, to be handled by ace rider Pat Dilema, is expected to get to the lead early on in the absence of other noted speedballs, while Neat Laurel may just float along and then put up a big run in the stretch.

"Pag pinabayaan nila 'to sa harapan may tulog sila (If they allow her to set the pace, they may be caught flat-footed)," said Dilema on Royal Catch, a fast-stepping 5-year-old roan who drew the favorable stall No. 1.

On the other hand, Neat Laurel appears to be ready to get back to the winner's enclosure since her impressive victory in the PSA Cup last May.

"Nagisilbing bataak yung pagkakasegunda niya last week. Tingin ko handa na uling manalo (Her second-place finish last week served as a good tune-up. I think she's ready to win again)," said Jesse Guce on Neat Laurel, the 5-year-old mare who landed second to Dandansoy in the Klub Don Juan de Manila Golden Girl Stakes last Oct. 24 at San Lazaro.

Posing threats to Esguerra's entries are Art of Rose and Lord of Ali, first and second placers, respectively, in the recent Philtobo Classic, as well as battle-tested Lyonnais. Completing the cast are Glamour and Mossette.

Veterans Jose Macaraig and Esteban de Vera retained their rides on Art of Rose and Lord of Ali while Elpidio Aguila will be back to steer Lyonnais. John Cordero partners Glamour while Jeffru Zarate mounts Mossette.

Esguerra's other horses are also tipped to perform creditably in the other featured events.

Ouzo and Real Slew are battling West Bound and Being There in the La Mirada Mile, while Marque and Crystal Show are heading the cast in the Ruzal Technopark Mile. Ragini takes part in the Glenrose Specia, Hellfire sees action in the Woodridge Heights Specia, while Sugar Ray, the former Black Gold, tries to nail down a long-sought win when he runs in the Orchard Special.

Dilema is also guiding Ouzo, Crystal Show, Ragini and Sugar Ray, while Guce skips Real Slew and Marque. Ronald Baklonido will sub for Angelito Laguanto on Hellfire.

The event is jointly backed by the Philracom under chair Jimmy Dilag, Philippine Racing Club and Sta. Lucia Realty and Dev. Corp.

RP grabs Hong Kong amateur title

HONG KONG—Jay Bayron shot a gutsy two-under par 69 to secure the victory for the Philippine team while firming up his bid for the individual crown after three rounds of play in the Aquascutum Hong Kong Open Amateur and Mid Amateur Golf Championships at the Hong Kong Golf Club's Old course in Pongling Saturday.

Bayron wore down Tommy Manotoc in their head-to-head duel, closing out with a 33-36 card that proved enough to keep his overnight lead of three strokes heading into the final round of the annual event, which stakes a berth in the rich Hong Kong Omega Championship slated here in December.

Bayron's 69 likewise held off the charging Taiwanese squad in their bid to snatch the crown in the 54-hole team competition as the Filipinos, with Erwin Vinluan counting for team with a 73, closed out with a 142 for a 54-hole total of 420.

Jun Bernis, winner of three titles back home, including the national championship, floundered with a 76 and didn't count in the three-to-play, two-to-count format event.

Taiwan, which started the round four shots behind the Filipinos, threatened to steal the thunder behind Shih Chang Chan, who sizzled with a 68. But Shih failed to muster support from his teammates with Po Ming Chen, who shot a 69 in the second round, limped with a 73. Chua Cheng Shih didn't count with an 81.

Vinluan, who also counted for the team in the first round, actually appeared headed for an explosive day with a birdie-birdie opening but he lost his touch on the par-5 No. 6, where he made an 8 after going out-of-bounds twice on his second shot.

After shooting a 68 in the second day, Bernis struggled from tee to green all day, holing out with a bogey on the 18th after barely slicing his drive into the wooded area. He punched into the greenside bunker and muffed a six-foot putt for par.

But Bayron, whose stint here is sanctioned by the National Golf Association of the Philippines and backed by NGAP secretary general Adm. Luisito Fernandez, Mizuno and the Philippine Sports Commission, remained the most consistent player in the team, matching Manotoc's two-under card after nine holes then bucked a bogey on the 15th that ruined his running three-under card.

He did approach poorly from around 75 yards on the par-4 18th but pitched superbly for a tap-in birdie and a 69.

That gave the former caddies champion a 54-hole aggregate of 206 as he kept his three-shot lead intact in the individual championship, although this time over Shih, who had a 209.

Manotoc fell a stroke farther with a 210 after that 70 but remained a threat just the same with one round left in the event, where the winner will earn the right to play against the pros in the Hong Kong Omega Open.

Golden shines, ties Park at top

JEJU, South Korea—Kate Golden fired an eight-under par 64 on Saturday to tie South Korea's Grace Park for the lead after a second round at the CJ Nine Bridges Classic.

With a two-day total of 135, Golden and Park were two strokes ahead of Jill McGill of the United States, and Soo-Yun Kang and defending champion Shi Hyun Ahn, both from South Korea.

"It was just a really good day. I drove the ball well and think I hit every fairway," said Golden, who carded six birdies and sank a dramatic 20-foot putt for an eagle in the par-5 18.

"When I hit the putt, I didn't think I hit it hard enough," the American said, describing her eagle putt.

Hoping to win her second LPGA Tour title this year, Park shot a 69 Saturday with four birdies and one bogey at the par-4 8th hole. She led the first round with a 66.

Park attracted a big following of home fans at the 5,764-meter (6,306-yard) Nine Bridges Club in Jeju, a resort island off South Korea's south coast.

"I have a huge amount of family and friends following me all three days. It's nice to see everyone," she said.

"I love getting the support. They're very cheerful."

Top-ranked Annika Sorenstam, who carded a 71 in the first round, fired a 67 on Saturday for a two-day total of 138.

SPANISH golfer Sergio Garcia puts in the 17th hole during the second round of the Volvo Masters at the Valderrama Golf Club in San Roque, Spain.

Hot Aussie leads Sanya by 3 shots

SANYA, China—Terry Pilkadaris celebrated his 31st birthday by shooting five straight birdies Saturday to take a three-stroke lead going into the final round of the Sanya Open.

Filipino Gerald Rosales is five shots down with a 205.

Pilkadaris shot a six-under-par 66 to take his three-day total to 16-under par 200, just days after winning the inaugural Shanghai Open.

The Australian bogeyed the second hole but came rallied to start his birdie run on the sixth. Course officials presented him with a cake and a chorus of "Happy Birthday" after his round.

"I had a good rhythm out there and standing over the putts, I felt really confident," Pilkadaris said.

"I won't do anything different tomorrow and will stick to my routine, and have some fun," he said.

Taiwan's Chang Tse-peng matched Pilkadaris' 66 to move into second place with a three-day total of 203.

Chinese favorite Liang Wen-chong and Thai veteran Boonchu Ruangkit fired rounds of 66 and 64, respectively to finish the day four strokes off the lead.

Sn Lanka's Anura Rohana tied the course record with a 63 to share fifth place with Korea's Charlie Wi, Rosales and Americans Gerry Norquist and Clay Devers.

THE CLEVELAND Cavaliers' LeBron James soars in the match. James will be one of the players to watch in the Late rally gives Garcia cushion

SOTOGRADE, Spain—Sergio Garcia birdied the last two holes to overcome a poor start and a referee's inquiry Friday to record a two-under-par 69 and snatch a one-stroke lead in the Volvo Masters at Valderrama.

But before his position was confirmed, Garcia had to survive a 30-minute investigation into whether he had broken the rules.

It was alleged he had not declared a second shot off the tee at the 196-yard third hole a provisional ball and then played that ball without knowing that spectators had found the original.

Chief referee John Paramor finally absolved Garcia of any blame and he had stood.

Under golf rules, once a player has his first putt with a provisional ball, it then becomes the ball in play and the original is deemed to be lost.

After a bogey at the first hole and a double bogey five at the third, Garcia birdied five holes on the back nine to move past Alastair Forsyth into the lead with a six-under-par total of 136.

The Scot bogeyed the last for a 69 and was in turn one clear of Ian Poulter, whose 67 contained no dropped shots.

But Darren Clarke was not so fortunate as he piled up a disastrous six-over-par 11 at Valderrama's treacherous 536-yard (490-meter) 17th hole, where the green slopes forward with a lake right in front of it.

After playing the first 16 holes Friday in four under, Clarke hit his second shot into a bunker at the 17th.

It went from bad to worse.

"I hit a sand wedge which spun back into the water," he said.

"I dropped out, hit another one from 70 yards (64 meters), another really good shot right behind the flag. It pitched back and kept going into the water. Back to the drop zone, hit another, a bit heavy. It pitched over the flag and came back into the water."

"I hit another to the back edge of the green. It spun back but stayed up on top. Two putts, 11."

Until then, he had a fine round going.

"I was five under par, on top of the leaderboard," he said.

Now he shares 25th place.

Red Sox victory curses markets

BOSTON—Unbelievable as it may seem, not everyone in New England is thrilled about the Red Sox winning the World Series.

Retailers of everything from T-shirts to ice cream and cookies had been making money off the team's championship drought for years. When the Red Sox finished off a World Series sweep of the St. Louis Cardinals on Wednesday to win their first title since 1918, the long-reliable marketing strategy fell apart.

But the retailers aren't surrendering to history; they're just modifying their message. An ice cream company is staging a contest to rename its "Reverse the Curse" flavor, and apparel makers are trying gimmicks like printing the word "curse" backward to signify its reversal.

"This is a challenge for creative thinking," said Stephen A. Greyser, a Harvard Business School professor and marketing expert.

No matter what new slogans emerge, retailers admit it will be tough to top "The Curse of the Bambino," named because of Boston owner Harry Frazee's decision to sell Babe Ruth to the New York Yankees.

"I think it's naive to think it won't tail off some," said Chuck Green, president and chief executive of Brigham's Ice Cream, the company behind the flavor renaming contest. "But a lot of people said, 'Just because we won, don't stop making this stuff.' We think it has a little more legs to it than what I would call 'hula hoops' items."

Brigham's, which sells its ice cream at its 26 Boston-area shops and at supermarkets, introduced the Reverse the Curse flavor in May. A pair of spiritualists blessed the first batch produced at the Arlington factory as a hared Babe Ruth-lookalike took off a Yankees jersey to display a Red Sox shirt underneath.

The flavor—vanilla with chocolate, fudge, caramel and peanuts—became the fastest-selling new flavor in the chain's 90-year history.

At a downtown store on Thursday, the line of customers extended out onto the street, and owner Vinnie Jankord placed special orders to keep the flavor in stock.

Green credits the flavor for a nearly 10 percent sales increase in his company's 16-flavor line over the baseball season.

Brigham's plans to announce a winner of its renaming contest on Sunday. The company is making good on the promise it made in the spring, when Brigham's counted itself among the Sox optimists expecting 2004 to be the year the curse was broken.

Hundreds of suggestions from customers—including some unprintable references to the hated Yankees—have been narrowed down to four finalists: Curse Reversed, Believe It, Sox Rock and Fenway Faithfuls.

Greyser said getting customers hooked on the flavor, rather than its name, is the key to its survival.

Chut's makes Platinum Cup

By Marsong R. Castillo

CHUT's barged into the national finals of the Battle of the Courts Platinum Inter-Club Badminton championships yesterday after the first day of the withdrawal-riddled North eliminations.

Chut's wound up with a perfect 5-0 slate after downing Sure Play-Murphy, 3-0, in the only elimination round game played in Group C of the event sponsored by Inquirer Badminton and Globe Platinum.

Host Olympic Badminton, Bartie Door, C-4 and Banawe all withdrew because of problems in player eligibility, leaving Chut's and Sure Play-Murphy to battle it out for the top honors.

The North leg drew a total of 18 teams, which were divided into three groups. Only the top teams in each group advance to the national finals set Nov. 21 and 22 at the Market Market in Fort Bonifacio.

Eight Metro Manila teams and three teams from the South will vie in the national finals.

Pohang of Bacolod, Cebu and Holiday S, Davao have been seeded, where a holiday is at stake.

The tournament is a doubles, singles, mixed doubles, and a special shuttlecock, Nestle drink provider, Gerflor official mat and West Plaza as the official hotel. Lei San Antonio was made it 1.0 on 1.0.

Gabica rules 9-Ball tilt

CEBUANO ace Antonio Gabica beat Dennis Orcullo, 17-6, for the Morolite 9-Ball Philippine Open title last Friday at the Casino Filipino Amphitheater in Paranaque City.

Gabica raced to a 5-0 lead as Orcullo failed to run out an open table on the second frame.

Orcullo stemmed the bleeding on the sixth frame, but Gabica strung 11 straight to reach the hill at 16-1 en route to the championship trophy and the P500,000 top prize.

Orcullo went home with the P200,000 runner-up prize, while losing semifinalists Ramil Gallego and Ronnie Aciano earned P100,000 each.

Meanwhile, Southeast Asian Games

gold winner (9-ball doubles event) Warren Kiamco failed to participate in the 2004 Tokyo 9-ball Open after getting robbed of his passport and his Rado watch worth P10,000 yesterday morning.

Kiamco, who lives in Murphy, Quezon City, said the watch did not matter, what he needs is his passport with Japan and US visa.

Defending champion Alex Pagulayan will spearhead the country's bid in the event along with Filipino billiard master Efren "Bata" Reyes, Francisco "Django" Bustamante, Antonio Lingang, and the Solar Sports-backed trio of Gabica, Orcullo and Gallego. The tournament starts tomorrow.

Novak hurts Henman's Masters chances

BASEL, Switzerland—World No. 4 Tim Henman was knocked out in the quarter-finals of the Swiss Indoors tournament on Friday, falling, 7-6 (7-5), 7-5, to unseeded Czech Jin Novak.

There was further bad news for Henman when Argentine fourth seed David Nalbandian staged a remarkable quarterfinal comeback to beat German sixth seed Rainer Schuettler, 4-6, 7-6 (7-5), 6-3.

Nalbandian, who had trailed by a set and a break, needed the win to keep alive his slim chances of overtaking Henman in the race for next month's lucrative Masters Cup.

Henman, though, can make sure of a place in the eight-strong Masters Cup field by reaching the quarterfinals at next week's Paris Masters.

"It's a bit soon to think about my feelings for Paris but it's going to be an important week for sure," Henman said.

"Of course it's disappointing to go out here in Basel, but I'll be coming away with a lot more positive aspects than I did after last week's Masters Series tournament in Madrid."

"I feel like I'm hitting the ball well again now, and playing well, and the fact that I'm defending the title in Paris will also give me confidence."

Certainly there was little to separate Henman and Novak, but a few stray shots from the Briton coupled with greater Novak efficiency on the break points were enough to see the Czech through.

Novak, who also ended Henman's medal hopes in the first round of the Athens Olympics, will now face Austrian world number 73 Stefan Koubek in the Basel semifinals.

Koubek fought back from a set down on Friday to beat Croatia's Ivan Ljubicic, 2-6, 7-5, 7-5, a win which earned the 27-year-old from Klagenfurt his first ATP semifinal place this year.

Saturday's second semifinal will pit Nalbandian against double Olympic gold medalist Nicolas Pietrangeli.

The 25-year-old Chilean beat Czech Bohdan Ulihrach, 6-2, 7-6 (7-4), on Friday to register his best tour result since Athens.

"After Athens it was difficult for me to concentrate on my career because in Chile my Olympic win was so big," Pietrangeli said.

"But I'm feeling good again now and I can win my semi-final, I think I can win the title."

NBA PREVIEW

Pistons back and even better

AUBURN HILLS, Mich.—Chauncey Billups couldn't stop a grin from slowly spreading across his face.

Could the defending NBA champion Detroit Pistons be even better this season?

You bet. With a true team, the Pistons made it look easy, stunning the basketball world by knocking off the dysfunctional star-studded Los Angeles Lakers to win it all in five games.

The Pistons may be in even better shape for a title run this season with a starting lineup that features five players in, or entering, the prime of their careers and a bench bolstered by savvy off-season acquisitions.

"I'm excited," said Billups, the Finals Most Valuable Player. "I'll take our chances."

Castoffs

Former Pistons star Joe Dumars, now Detroit's president of basketball operations, assembled a championship team with a bunch of castoffs. Now Dumars might have added another key player that other teams didn't want. After staying up late to watch Antonio McDyess play about 25 games toward the end of last season for the Phoenix Suns, Dumars signed the former All-Star and Olympian to a $23-million, four-year deal to take the spot of Mehmet Okur, who signed a free-agent deal with Utah.

The power forward has averaged 16.7 points, 8.5 rebounds and 1.6 blocks during his eight-year career, but has been plagued by injuries the past three years.

With jaw-dropping dunks and blocks in practice, McDyess looks healthy.

Good addition

"Dyess looks like the old Dyess to me," forward Rasheed Wallace said. "He looks like a good addition."

Though center Ben Wallace and coach Larry Brown have added an NBA championship to their resumé for the first time, they are not approaching the challenge of winning a title again the same way.

"They say it's hard to repeat, but I think the first one is tougher," said Wallace, a two-time All-Star and Defensive Player of the Year.

Brown, Detroit's perfectionist coach, is one of many who say repeating is harder than winning a championship the first time.

"We can't get complacent and we can't forget how we won the first one by playing together," Brown said. "I think a second championship is more difficult because everybody is going to be shooting at us."

Starters back

Detroit's entire starting lineup of players 30 or younger is back: Ben Wallace, Billups, Richard Hamilton, Rasheed Wallace and Tayshaun Prince.

The Pistons lost three top reserves—Okur, Corliss Williamson and Mike James—and added McDyess, Derrick Coleman, Carlos Delfino and Ronald Dupree. They also re-signed veteran reserves Lindsey Hunter and Darvin Ham, and brought back Elden Campbell.

With such a stacked lineup, Darko Milicic likely will spend another season watching from the bench, just as the Pistons figured he would when they drafted him No. 2 overall in 2003.

"We're deep, talented and big," Dumars said. "We have experience and we're battle-tested. Those are great traits to go into the season with. The least of my concerns are about us getting arrogant, cocky or overconfident."

Brown will help make sure of that.

Sloppy

The Hall of Fame coach filled a void in his career with his first NBA title last season, but he's driving the players just as hard as he did a year ago. Many of his practices during training camp stretched to three hours and included the detail-oriented drills Brown is known for, and even pre-season games made him grumpy.

"I haven't been real happy," Brown said. "We've been real careless in practice and sloppy in games."

Soon after beating the Lakers, the Pistons said they would not have won the title without Rasheed Wallace.

He was acquired, with an expiring contract, from Atlanta in a three-team deal just before the trading deadline for reserves and two No. 1 picks. Adding him gave Detroit a swagger it lacked, another option on offense and made a great defense, one of the best in league history.

League records

The Pistons made re-signing Rasheed Wallace their top priority, and they did with a $57-million, five-year contract.

The Pistons are convinced they will be even better overall this season, especially on defense—where it might be tough to improve. Last season, Detroit and San Antonio allowed 84.3 points per game, the third-lowest scoring average since the league began using a shot clock during the 1954-55 season.

The Pistons set league records by holding 11 opponents—including five straight—under 70 points, and 36 straight opponents to less than 100.

"I think we're a lot more athletic and bigger than we were last year and that should make us a better defensive team," Billups said. AP

Spurs net preseason win vs Hornets; Sonics score

SAN ANTONIO—Tim Duncan scored 17 points to lead the San Antonio Spurs over the New Orleans Hornets, 102-86, Friday.

Tony Parker added 16 points for San Antonio, and newly acquired Brent Barry scored 14.

Barry, who left Seattle as a free agent after last season, was 5-of-6 from the field and 4-of-5 from 3-point range. Reserve Tony Massenburg scored 12 points in 14 minutes.

Baron Davis led the Hornets (3-5) with 21 points, and Chris Anderson had nine rebounds in 25 minutes.

In Toronto, Vince Carter scored 20 points as Toronto beat Cleveland, 100-92.

Robert Traylor had 30 points and 11 rebounds for the Cavaliers (6-2).

Carter missed Toronto's two previous preseason games to deal with a lawsuit filed by a former agent. Carter is expected to return to Columbia, South Carolina, for the trial on Monday, but will be back for Toronto's season-opener at home against Houston on Wednesday night.

In Indianapolis, Indiana guard Reggie Miller broke a bone in his left hand in the Pacers' 98-79 loss to Denver.

Miller left the game in the first quarter, clutching his non-shooting hand. He will be examined Saturday to determine the extent of the injury.

In Minneapolis, Kevin Garnett had 22 points and nine rebounds to lead Minnesota over Detroit, 102-95.

Troy Hudson, in his first game action since March 29, sparked Minnesota with nine second-half points. The Timberwolves' backup point guard is recovering from offseason surgery on his right ankle.

Fred Hoiberg and Eddie Griffin added 15 each for Minnesota (4-4), which starts the regular season Wednesday at home against New York.

Richard Hamilton had 21 points and nine assists for Detroit (3-5), which had 24 turnovers.

In Sacramento, California, Joe Johnson had 21 points, seven rebounds and seven assists to help Phoenix beat Sacramento, 124-96.

The Suns had a 28-point lead at halftime and the Kings never cut the lead below 20 points in the second half.

Amare Stoudemire had 19 points and seven rebounds for Phoenix. Shawn Marion had 18 points and eight rebounds, Quentin Richardson made five 3-pointers and scored 18 points. Steve Nash added 11 points and eight assists.

Peja Stojakovic hit five 3-pointers and scored 21 points for the Kings.

In Seattle, Ray Allen scored 32 points, including a tiebreaking 3-pointer with 24.6 seconds left, as Seattle edged Portland, 91-87.

Allen, who missed the previous two games with a sore back, scored 17 points in the fourth quarter and had eight of Seattle's last nine. AP

SLOPPY plays such as this fumble by Rasheed Wallace against Minnesota's Ervin Johnson make Detroit coach Larry Brown feel that winning a second title will be difficult.

Jazz give Kirilenko richest contract

SALT LAKE CITY, Utah—The Utah Jazz said Friday they had agreed to a multi-year extension with All-Star forward Andrei Kirilenko, which is reportedly the most lucrative in the National Basketball Association club's history.

The Jazz did not disclose financial terms. But news reports said Kirilenko would sign a maximum contract of six years for $86 million.

ESPN and the Salt Lake Tribune also reported the Jazz would likely defer some of the money beyond the six-year term of the deal. Under the NBA's collective bargaining agreement, up to 30 percent of a player's compensation can be deferred.

"Andrei is not only our longest-tenured player; he brings toughness and leadership to the team," Jazz president Dennis Haslam said. "We are extremely fortunate to have signed this extension."

With the departure of future Hall of Famers John Stockton and Karl Malone, Russia's Kirilenko came into his own last season when he averaged 16.5 points and 8.1 rebounds in 78 games.

Known for his hustle, Kirilenko, 23, has garnered the reputation as one of the hardest workers in the league. He has increased his scoring and rebounding average in each of the last three seasons.

He has career averages of 13.0 points and 6.1 rebounds in 240 games and said he was looking forward to the future in Utah.

"We have a young, potentially great team—and a legendary coach (Jerry Sloan)," Kirilenko said. "We have a great organization and it's a great confidence to build a team that can dominate the next few years in the league." AFP

Agassi marches to Stockholm final 4

STOCKHOLM—Top seed Andre Agassi marched into the Stockholm Open semifinals on Friday, beating Spanish eighth seed Fernando Verdasco, 7-6, 6-2, in his hardest match of the tournament.

Second seed Joachim Johansson, however, retired with a fever from his quarterfinal against his Swedish compatriot, Michael Ryderstedt.

Johansson won the first set, 6-3, but withdrew when Ryderstedt broke him to 5-3 in the second.

Verdasco, untroubled by the crowd's support for the American, matched Agassi in the opening set as both dominated with their service.

"He's tough for anyone to play," said Agassi.

"He's left-handed with a very big serve. It's a difficult serve to read and to return and then he has a very big forehand, so if you just get it in play and you give him the chance to hit the forehand, the point is finished," Verdasco, specializing in aces, needed only to fight off one break point on the way to the tiebreak but failed to sustain his excellence as Agassi broke him in the tiebreak to 5-4 before serving out.

In the following set, Agassi started to read Verdasco's serve, breaking the Spaniard to 2-0 and again to 6-2 to seal the match.

"In a tiebreaker you get a little lucky or you get a little unlucky but in the second set I started to get more returns in and to play more from the baseline and I felt very comfortable then."

"I played a good first game to break him, and then once I was in the lead I think it was a big difference." The Las Vegas next faces fourth seed Tommy Haas, who defeated Belgian Olivier Rochus, 6-3, 7-6. Both Haas and Agassi have yet to lose a set.

"We played twice this summer, back-to-back in Los Angeles and in Canada in Toronto, one and one, we played three sets both times. So it's always a difficult match," said Agassi of Germany's former world No. 2.

"Tommy is in my opinion one of the best players in the world, he should be up at the top."

Taking on another Swede in the semis, Ryderstedt faces 2002 Australian Open champion Thomas Johansson, who overcame a foot injury to beat Romanian third seed Andre Pavel, 7-6, 7-5.

Quezon keeps URBL semis hopes burning

SAN FERNANDO, Pampanga—The Quezon Province Huskers held steady down the stretch to thwart home crowd favorite Harbour Centre-Pampanga, 103-94, yesterday to keep their semifinal hopes alive in the United Regional Basketball League (URBL) at the University of the Assumption here.

It was the highest-scoring game so far in the league. New recruit Egay Echavez, who topped with 21 points, including four triples, delivered the crucial plays as the Huskers now joined the Ilocos Sur Snipers in third place totalling similar 2-3 cards.

Harbour Centre absorbed its second straight setback but remained in sole second spot with a 4-3 card behind undefeated M. Lhuillier-Cebu City (7-0).

Echavez hit three-of those triples in the third period as the Huskers pulled away, 83-71. But with loud cheers from the jam-packed crowd, Harbour Centre fought back behind Marvin Yambao and Pet Duyag to threaten at 91-94 with 1:16 left.

Jojo Manalo had a stellar debut in the league backed by Lactovitale and Adidas as he topscored Harbour Centre with 23, but was limited to only seven in the second half due to early foul trouble.

After the Halloween break, URBL action continues on Nov. 5 with Lactovitale-Cebu Province (1-5) fighting for survival against M. Lhuillier at the Don Celestino Martinez Coliseum in Bogo, Cebu.

Mike Arroyo's support sought for Gerry fight

By Salven L. Lagumbay

ORGANIZERS of Gerry Peñalosa's fight for the WBF crown are seeking the support of First Gentleman Mike Arroyo.

The 32-year-old Peñalosa guns for the vacant World Boxing Foundation superfly title when he takes on undefeated Thai Bangsae Sithpraprom on Nov. 27 at the Casino Filipino in Paranaque.

Promoter Gabriel "Bebot" Elorde Jr., son of the legendary Flash Elorde, said Filipinos should rally behind this laudable sporting event.

"Kailangan tataga natin ang support ni First Gentleman, alam ko malapit sa puso niya ang boxing, at naambitahan ko na rin siya nuong laban ni Pacquiao sa Lince, ta," Elorde said.

The undercard of the event, for the benefit of St. Rita Orphanage, will also feature three WBF International bouts.

The southpaw Peñalosa (47-5-2, 32 KO's), is hot on the comeback trail and has indicated that, should he win the WBF crown, his next move would be to call out the reigning champions of the WBC, WBA, IBF and WBO for a planned unification bout.

Leon Panoncilio, chair of the World Boxing Organization Asia-Pacific, had earlier hinted that should Peñalosa win the WBF crown on Nov. 27, he would try to arrange a possible unification bout with Hernandez or a grudge rematch with WBO bantam champ Ratanachai Vorapin, whom Peñalosa had knocked out in their first encounter.

San Andres competes in Macau event today

REVTEX standout rider Kenneth San Andres faces the biggest challenge yet of his colorful career when he pits guts and skills with Asia's best in the centerpiece Expert 125cc category of the FIM-Asia Motocross Championships Round 4 in Macau, China, today.

San Andres is dipping his hat in the Pro Open category for the first time in the FIM motocross festival against the region's greatest bikers at that, but his father and coach Jun-Jun Andres says his son welcomes the challenge.

"I am amazed because he is even excited about his golden chance. Gusto talaga niya," said Jun-Jun. "He probably realizes that this is his best opportunity to hone his talents to the fullest. If he wants to be the best, he has to ride with the best."

The best, of course, includes FIM Asia-Pacific defending champion Glen Aguilar and Revtex daredevil Bebet

Aguilar—San Andres' teammates, who will be with him pitting their talent with the world's top riders from China, Japan, Australia, New Zealand, Malaysia, Indonesia, Thailand, India, Mongolia, Guam and the USA.

The three Caltex Revtex mainstays were chosen by the National Motorcycle Sports and Safety Association (Namssa) on the strength of their showing in the Camel Supercross. Joining the three to Macau is Jerick Mitra, also of Revtex.

Aside from Aguilar and Dela Cruz, San Andres, who is backed by JBS Motorcycle Shop, KTM, Oakley, HJC Helmet, Renthal, Fox, UFO and Sukoda Motorcycles, also has to contend with current FIM leader Tadazaki Ohtsuka of Japan and Aep Dadang of Indonesia.

San Andres has stayed fit and sharp for the coming Macau race not just through practice but in actual competitions locally.

PAGUNSAN: Brilliant recovery from double-bogey 6 on 13th hole.

Juvic shoots 70, but RP slips in World Amateur

JUVIC Pagunsan battled back from a double bogey six on No. 13 yesterday to churn out a two-under 70, but he did not get enough help as the Philippines slipped into a tie for 25th place in the World Amateur Golf championships.

The long-hitting ace actually dropped four strokes in a three-hole span at Rio Mar's tough River Course in Rio Grande, Puerto Rico, with bogeys sandwiching that double as he checked out with a 37 after a 33 in his first nine.

Artemio Murakami and Michael Bibat both struggled with 78s, and the Philippines, from one-under at the start of the round and an 18th place tie, is now at three-over 291 and way out of the pace still being set by the United States.

The Americans, who are looking to win the Eisenhower Trophy for the third straight year, got a 67 from Ryan Moore and a 69 from Spencer Levin for a 268 aggregate, 20-under and eight strokes ahead of second-placed Spain.

Wales, Switzerland and Sweden are tied for third spot with nine-under cards and from the way things stand and with the support crew not responding for Pagunsan, a repeat of a best-ever third place finish seems out of sight for the Philippines.

Pagunsan, a member of that record-setting team in Malaysia in 2002, birdied Nos. 2, 4, 5 and 8 in the front side, giving back a stroke on the third. He got back to four-under with another birdie on 11 before that horrid stretch.

The Canlubang ace in the PAL Interclub has a five-under total, the bulk of his score coming on the par 5s, all of which he birdied yesterday and three of the four in the first round.

Murakami had two birdies, two doubles and four bogeys, while Bibat, who won the Singapore Amateur last month, had a 42 in his final nine holes after a bogey on 16, a double on 17 and a triple bogey 8 on No. 11.

Korean lady tandem rules Sherwood Chairman's Cup

LADY golfers Sung Shin Lee and Kyung Roh scored a combined 140 points to rule the third Chairman's Cup at the plush Sherwood Hills Golf and Country Club in Trece Martires, Cavite.

That 140 via the 2-man team aggregate scoring format gave Lee (69) and Roh (71) the overall championship in the one-day tournament sponsored by Globe Platinum, Golf-Force Inc., Information Professionals Inc., and MRT Dev. Co.

Lee and Roh received their championship trophy from club chair Robert John Sobrepeña.

Asia Pacific Golf Corp., Club Leisure, Copertone, Custom Clubmakers, Federal Management, Hyatt Regency Manila, Isuzu Phils., Industrial Waste Systems, Kia Motors, Kork Inc., Pfizer and Twinings Tea were the other sponsors.

Shin Young Kang and Gook Sa Han came up with 78 and 68, respectively, for 140 points to beat via countback the team of Nini Samaniego and Arlette Dizon in Division 1.

Andy Morales and Manny Velasco collected 140 points (72-68) to capture the Division 2 honors. Joseph Sison and Rene Floro was second with 143 (74-69).

Dragon rowers capture 2 golds

MIANYANG, China—The Philippine dragon boat racing team capped its two-week Chinese invasion by capturing two gold and one silver medals in the two-day 5th Asian championships which ended here Thursday.

The Filipinos ruled the 250-meter and 500-m races, both times at the expense of the powerful Guangdong, China squad, to maintain their spectacular winning run in international competitions.

The Filipinos clocked 48.24 seconds in the 250 and one minute 34.44 seconds in the 500.

The Chinese took the silver with times of 48.72 seconds and 1:36.77. Guest team Australia was third in the 250 in 53.06 seconds, while Macao grabbed the bronze in the 500 in 1:41.61.

The Chinese avenged their twin losses by beating the Filipinos in the 1000-m race. The Guangdong rowers capitalized on the standing-row position, a skill the Chinese paddlers initiated, to win in 3 minutes 21.12 seconds.

The Filipinos took the silver in 3:25.21, while the Aussies settled for the bronze in 3:32.93.

Other countries which competed in the Asian event were Hong Kong, Malaysia, Japan and Chinese Taipei.

The Filipinos became instant celebrities here when they were featured in the front pages of local dailies.

"It was a big reward for their hard work," said RP coach Nestor Ilagan of his team's fine showing.

PBL Open takes new twists, baffling turns

THIS early, the 2004 PBL Open Championship has taken some surprising turns. And interestingly among them is the contrasting start of last conference's finalists.

Defending champion Magnolia Ice Cream-FEU took the top spot with an early 2-0 lead, while losing finalist Welcoat Paintmasters occupied the bottom of the standings after absorbing two straight losses.

"I just told my players to have a proper mind-set and they did," said coach Roy Banal after the Ice Cream Wizards crushed Toyota Onse-Letran, 87-61, last Thursday.

The recent match-up, which was pretty much settled in the first half, was an easy follow-up to the Wizards' tough opening victory against the vastly improved Montafia Jewels.

The Wizards outlasted the Jewels, 82-75, in double overtime.

Although Arwind Santos, the reigning Most Valuable Player of the PBL and the UAAP, is the focal point of Magnolia's game plan, the telling factor is the team's balanced offense.

The Morayta contingent can always turn to a number of key players like Unity Cup Finals MVP Warren Ybañez, Dennis Miranda, RJ Rizada, Mark Isip, Gerard Jones and Cesar Catili.

The Paintmasters, the team that bagged five titles in eight finals appearances, were favored to win two in a row. But instead, they lost both games in double digits.

Welcoat bowed to the younger Toyota Otis-Letran, 63-52, on opening day and again tumbled with a 70-59 defeat against Montafia recently.

It's quite a disappointment for this pre-season favorite bannered by veterans Chester Toloma, Marvin Ortuerra, Jay-R Reyes and former NCAA MVP Leo Nazjorda.

The team's record is also a debut spoiler for Welcoat's highly touted rookie, the 6-foot-7 Fil-Am Anthony Washington, who averaged 14.5 points in his first two games.

On Tuesday, this multititled squad again hopes to reverse its fortune. But it apparently won't come easy as Welcoat tries to score its first win by facing its Finals foe, Magnolia-FEU. Jasmine W. Payo

Eala expects Asi case versus PBA resolved soonest

By June Navarro

PB.A. Commissioner Noli Eala expects the lawsuit filed by Asi Taulava against league officials to be resolved within the next few days.

Eala said the Quezon City Regional Trial Court may reach a decision as early as Tuesday based on the progress of the hearing on Taulava's P1.2-million damage suit filed recently.

Taulava filed the case Thursday last week against Eala and the PBA Board of Governors after the Talk 'N Text storman was suspended by the league on the strength of a Department of Justice ruling.

"Our counsel is done cross-examining him (Taulava) and their counsel has already cross-examined me. So I believe it (case) will be up for decision not later than Tuesday," said Eala.

"I think his counsels are in a hurry to get all these done and over with," he added.

Eala, however, declined to comment on the merits of the case. "It's up for the court to decide," he said. Although Taulava wasn't included in the DOJ deportation order against Red Bull's Davonn Harp, Mick Pennisi and John Ordonio, Rudy Hatfield of Coca-Cola and Ginebra's Alex Crisano, the Justice department found last year's MVP guilty of faking his citizenship documents.

The DOJ, however, can't pursue Taulava's deportation yet as the 6-foot-9 former national player had secured a court injunction even before the "Fil-shams" hunt intensified again this year.

Taulava, who is asking for P500,000 for actual damages, P500,000 for moral damages and P200,000 for attorney's fees, claimed Eala and the PBA board failed to exercise due process and honor his constitutional rights.

Even without Taulava, Talk 'N Text has managed to post a league-leading 5-win, 1-loss record, dropping its last game to Barangay Ginebra, 91-80, on Wednesday.

Shaq, Kobe wage war

Rizal pool tapped anew for SEAG '05

LOS ANGELES—Unable to set aside their differences in Los Angeles, Kobe Bryant and Shaquille O'Neal will now be facing new challenges with teams on either side of the continent.

The NBA superstars will be eager to show who is the better team leader as for the first time in nine years the former Laker teammates will not even compete in the same conference.

Former Laker coach Phil Jackson added fuel to Shaq-Kobe rivalry when he came out earlier this month with his tell-all book, "The Last Season."

Jackson painted Bryant as a selfish player who undercut the coach's authority and tried to drive a wedge between the players in the locker room.

Jackson's book revealed the extent of the bitterness between Bryant and O'Neal, who ended up being shipped to the Miami Heat in the off-season.

The trade set the stage for what has become the most anticipated game of the NBA season on Dec. 25 when Bryant's Lakers face the Heat in Los Angeles.

For eight years O'Neal and Bryant combined to become the most feared duo in the NBA, leading the Lakers to three consecutive championships (2000-2002).

Most NBA watchers feel O'Neal will have an easier time getting used to his new surroundings and teammates in Miami than Bryant will have in adjusting to life on the court without the giant center.

O'Neal, considered one of the most dominant inside players in history, has a new perimeter sidekick in Dwyane Wade, who averaged 16.1 points per game in his first season last year.

Indiana Pacers coach Rick Carlisle says the 22-year-old Wade could play a similar role to what Bryant played with O'Neal.

"It looks like it could be another Kobe-Shaq type of situation," Carlisle said. "The dominant inside player and the great perimeter guy that could also do things around the basket and in the post."

Miami coach Stan Van Gundy thinks O'Neal and Wade are a good fit.

"People are saying he will not have the lanes to the basket because Shaq clogs up the middle," Van Gundy said.

Bryant chose to remain in Los Angeles, but like O'Neal he will have a different starting cast around him.

Lakers new coach Rudy Tomjanovich defends Bryant saying he has seen none of the disparaging characteristics that Jackson talks about in his book.

He likes to describe Bryant, who signed a seven-year, $136-million contract in July, as "Jordanesque."

IT WILL still be the old Rizal Memorial pool for swimming and diving as the Philippine Southeast Asian Games Organizing Committee finalized yesterday the venues for the meet set Nov. 27 to Dec. 5, 2005.

While Cebu and Bacolod will host several sports, many events have also been scheduled out of Metro Manila, putting added burden on transportation requirement for the 11-nation meet. Philsoc expects to run on an P800-million budget.

Philippine Sports Commission chair Eric Buain said there will be a few venues that need renovation, mainly those inside the Rizal Memorial Sports Complex, but added most of them are ready for competition.

A big slice of the budget for renovation will go to refurbishing the Rizal pool. However, water polo will be held at the Kagitingan Wellness Center inside Fort Bonifacio.

"The thrust is to identify venues with the least cost in renovation," said Philsoc chair Obet Pagdanganan, who added he has already sought the support of the Department of Public Works and Highways in refurbishing the facilities.

Budget OK, says Philsoc

THERE should be no problem with the 2005 Southeast Asian Games budget after all.

That is after Maracañang instructed Philippine SEAG Organizing Committee (Philsoc) chair Obet Pagdanganan to negotiate with the government-owned and controlled corporations and the government financing institutions for their sponsorship of the biennial Games.

"With this kind of attention we're getting from President Arroyo, we can safely say that we

The 70-year-old Rizal complex will also host athletics, baseball, softball, wrestling, lawn tennis and gymnastics, while Casino Filipino in Paranaque will stage arts, body building and muay thai.

La Mesa Dam in Quezon City will be the site of canoeing/kayaking, rowing and dragonboat racing. Philsports will host badminton, table tennis, women's football and fencing. Basketball will be at Makati Coliseum, billiards and snookers at the Cuneta Astrodome and bowling either at Pearl Plaza in Paranaque or Green Valley in Pasig.

Cycling's track races will be held at the Amoranto velodrome, wushu will be at the GSIS gym, squash at the Makati Sports Club and shooting at Muntinlupa for skeet and trap. Marines range for pistol and PNP range for practical shooting.

Scheduled out of Metro Manila are chess (Tagaytay), equestrian (Carmona Riding School) and golf (Riviera in Silang, Cavite).

Bacolod will host boxing at the La Salle Bacolod gym, and men's football at the La Salle Bacolod grounds and Panaad sports complex. Volleyball will be at the Bacolod Sports Center.

Pastor races borrowed car to victories

ROSARIO, Batangas—Enzo Pastor, racing a borrowed car, beat veteran Jody Coseteng twice to rule the penultimate leg of the 2004 PCSO Grand Prix at the Batangas Racing Circuit here recently.

Pastor of Speedwelle Racing shone in the car lent to him by teammate Ferdie Ong, who was generous enough to beg off from the National Touring Car Championship races sanctioned by the Automobile Association of the Philippines (AAP)

Though not too familiar with the car's set-up, Pastor used his skills to dominate the morning and afternoon races.

He clocked 30:54.700 in the tightly contested morning race and won over SMB Strong Ice-Caltex Havoline's Coseteng by a mere 1.722 seconds.

Privateer Dominic Bon finished third while Philip Alvendia of Malayan Insurance and Rey Reyes of Autoklasse-Tropical Ice wound up fourth and fifth, respectively.

In the afternoon race, Coseteng took command early but yielded to Pastor in the third lap.

Pastor took the checkered flag with a quicker time of 29:03.693, a substantial 5.686 seconds ahead of Coseteng.

Reyes wound up third in the race followed by Bon and Alvendia.

Despite the setback, Coseteng remains on top in the overall race with 115 points.

P1-million purse in national Milo marathon finals

CLOSE to a million in total cash prizes is up for grabs in the 28th National Milo Marathon finals slated Nov. 14 at the Quirino Grandstand.

Pat Goc Ong, Milo Events sports executive, said the male and female champions in the 42-kilometer event will get P75,000 each plus handsomely crafted trophies.

Runners-up in both divisions will also receive trophies and P50,000 each, with third place worth P30,000 and trophies.

Aside from the centerpiece event, prizes are also at stake in the 5K and 10K distances in this annual foot race held in partnership with Globe Handphone, Adidas, Bayview Park Hotel, Cebu Pacific and the Department of Tourism.

A 3-km race for children 12 years old and below will also be on tap.

Special prizes for record breakers will also be given away, with P25,000 going to the first male runner who shatters the 2:20 barrier.

Breaking Eduardo Buenavista's long standing men's mark of 2:22:52 would mean P10,000, the same amount to be won by the first female participant who will better Christabel Martes' 2:53:58 record.

Side events like media run, sportswriting and photo contests, a biggest delegation for schools competition and a cheering and inter-school team competition will have a total of P102,000 in prizes.

Over 97,000 running enthusiasts and serious contenders have joined the prior 13 regional legs.

Registration is at the ground floor of the Vasquez Madrigal Plaza Bldg., at 51 Annapolis St. in Greenhills, San Juan. Deadline is on Nov. 10. Registration fees are P50 for the 3K run and P100 for the 5K and 10K runs.

Organizer Rudy Biscocho wants schools competing for the biggest delegation award to register early as only 8,000 race packets are allocated for the contest. Deadline for school entries is on Nov. 5.

What now, Red Sox?

Boston looks for meaning after ending 'curse'

BOSTON—It didn't take long to go from ecstatic to existential.

Having waited 86 years for a World Series victory, Bostonians found themselves on Thursday swirling with elation, but also scratching their heads.

What are Red Sox fans to do when the angst of being one of the world's greatest underdog is gone?

"I'm having trouble dealing with it," said Mike Andrews, who played second base for the Red Sox in 1967, when they lost to the Cardinals during one of their many close-but-no-cigar pennant races.

"You're just kind of caught saying 'what's next?'" said Andrews, who now oversees the Jimmy Fund, a cancer organization in Boston that is the team's principal charity.

"I don't want to say it's a let-down. But it's certainly something you let become part of your life and it's gone now, and we need to come up with something new."

The afterglow of the Red Sox's extraordinary World Series triumph over the St. Louis Cardinals has caught more than a few folks without their psychological sunblock.

"They're going to be heartbroken at not being heartbroken," said Leslie Epstein, a novelist who is chair of the creative writing department at Boston University and whose son, Theo, happens to be the Red Sox general manager. "It's not just a joke. That's what's made us unique. We were the Boston Red Sox that never could win."

For the next few days, of course, most fans will be reveling proudly, especially at a giant parade on Saturday that will wind from Fenway Park to City Hall and is expected to draw more than 3 million people.

And for some the victory can be seen as a harbinger that other miracles may come not just on the ballfield.

"Suddenly all things seem possible," said Samantha Power, a Pulitzer Prize-winning expert on genocide at Harvard's John F. Kennedy School of government. "For those of us who live with lost causes, it's a very inspiring perspective shift."

But Power also recognizes that she and many others will never feel quite the same about the Red Sox and about baseball.

She sees a chance for a city to lighten up.

"Maybe it will just become SIGNS OF THE TIMES: Massachusetts Gov. about a baseball rivalry instead of a humiliated city," she said. "It could make baseball less about the meaning of life and more about just baseball."

And, she said, almost as if to reassure herself, "that wouldn't be such a bad thing." New York Times

Travel agent suing cycling officials

By Marc Anthony Reyes

OFFICIALS of the Integrated Cycling Federation of the Philippines are under fire for failure to settle nearly P700,000 in plane tickets and hotel bookings during the 10th Asian Mountain Bike championships in Palawan last month.

Rolly Concepcion, owner of the RMC Travel Agency and father of former matinee idol Gabby Concepcion, claimed that because of the non-payment, his agency suffered losses after Philippine Airlines blocked their access in bookings of flights and confiscated all their unsold tickets.

He has threatened to sue the cycling officials.

"Had RMC travel insisted to stick by the contract (that ICFP pay on or before the 20th of September 2004) then the Philippine contingent would have been left behind and not participated," said Concepcion, citing the contract he has forged with the ICFP officials that originally amounted to P1,160,000.

ICFP secretary general Mar Mendoza said they were not reneging on the agreement. He said they were still waiting for the reimbursement of funds from the Philippine Sports Commission.

However, Concepcion insisted that it was Mendoza and Jun Lomibao, a fellow official, who signed the contract and must therefore be the ones responsible for paying the total amount of P691,574.

"That is unfair and misleading, making RMC Travel believe that the funds are available (when it's not)," said Concepcion.

Mendoza said they had tried to convince Concepcion to give them time until his fellow signatory arrives from abroad next week.

Concepcion, on the other hand, said his agency has even advanced 14 tickets before the contract was finalized as an "act of good faith."

Saragoza picks self up after letting RP down

By Mung R. Castillo

WITH two Philippine golf teams currently campaigning abroad, it's easy to understand why Boyet Saragoza was not considered to be on either one.

After shooting 82s in the final two rounds of the Singapore Amateur that literally cost the Philippines the team title, Saragoza was left out of national squads that are in Hong Kong and the World Amateurs in Puerto Rico.

Even Tommy Manotoc, usually very reserved and who accompanied Saragoza and eventual individual winner Michael Bibat in Singapore, chided his Canlubang ward for his foulup.

It was a stint to forget, but one that almost drove him mad and made him strive hard to make retribution come in so short a time.

The pint-sized former caddy at Davao's Apo course has won his final two starts, the first titles of his career that came in a three-week span.

After rallying to win the Samsung Championships, Saragoza humbled a tough field and solved the North Course's trying conditions to rule the Canlubang Amateurs on Friday by a mind-boggling 16 strokes.

And the win came after a change of driver and 11th hour adjustments on his swing made by Tony Arevalo, himself a former bagman who now acts as coach to Saragoza.

A glitch in the swing of the 31-year-old made Arevalo ask him to delay his downswing a little and keep his head down at impact for a longer follow through, elementary adjustments that resulted in the event's record score.

Saragoza totaled 271, 17-under, a score no one from the field came close to touching.

He shot rounds of 66, 68, 71 and 66, the only one in the field to shoot sub-par scores in all rounds and the only one who broke par in the final day, with the next best score, a 75, belonging to Korean second placer Kim Chang-hoi and national pool member Marvin Dumanan.

"What happened in Singapore was humiliating, because I let the country down," Saragoza said in Filipino. "I lost focus out there and I will not let that happen again."

"Of course, I would like to again play in an international event and make up for that. But the game of golf can be very unpredictable and you have to work hard to sustain your form."

Next up for Saragoza is a stint with either Canlubang or Calatagan in the Fil-Am in Baguio, a tournament he will prepare for starting this week.

He'll want to do well there, of course, if only to get another shot at a Philippine team stint.

SAMSUNG CELEBRITY CLASSIC

Southwoods gets star-struck

By Jong Arcano

SHAPELY songbird Vernie Varga showed up late to tee. But nobody could stop her from boarding the cart and playing whatever holes were left to play.

Johnny Delgado and Edgar Mortiz certainly did not show up in "fighting form."

Unmuffled of their rusty swings and, for some, their bulging waistlines, it was time to play golf for a horde of celebrities who found their way to Manila Southwoods yesterday for the first Samsung Celebrity Invitational Classic.

Even Gary Lising, undisputed pseudo golfer, was there puffing the cigarette for every bad shot that, yes, came too often.

There were just too many of them to count and the stars littered the course.

"This is just too overwhelming. I'm sure that the second one will even go bigger," said event organizer Kitchie Benedicto-Paulino, who pulled off the caper even on short notice.

Big name stars, most of them either too busy or too tired from a previous engagement, did come to join in the fun on the fairways.

Benedicto-Paulino's career in producing television shows is getting a second wind and part of the plan are specials on golf and sports in general.

And, if the huge production requirements seen at Southwoods were to be an indication, then KB Entertainment seems out to revive Kitchie's glory days.

Kitchie doesn't need to look too far to see the big promise.

"We're getting back to golf again, wala tayong trabaho," joked Sen. Tito Sotto who showed with brothers Vic, Val and Mari.

Willie Revillame felt he didn't have enough time to spend on the driving range that could have given him a better chance at winning.

However, just meeting old friends was enough to compensate for all the errant shots.

The ladies were there to add flavor and spice. The sight of Aiko Melendez and Candy Pangilinan laughing at their mistakes, the serious play of former Miss Universe Margie Moran-Flourendo, Princess Punzalan being far friendlier than the usual contra bida she's known for helped generate a lively mood amid the punishing winds and hot sun.

Vic Sotto and Anjo Yllana lost a day's pay at Eat Bulaga for playing yesterday. Not to worry though, they enjoyed their rounds so much they were aching for a rematch.

Food drive gains support

MORE runners have thrown their full support to the 2nd Manila Marathon slated Nov. 28 at the Rizal Park. Arnold "Ali" Aleniza, chief of the organizing Manila Sports Council (Masco), said their move to waive registration fees in exchange for donations of canned goods for indigent and underfed children in Kalliga and Antique contributed greatly to the bandwagon effect generated through the endeavor. "The public's response to our humble contribution for less fortunate children in the countryside is truly inspiring," said the son of Manila Mayor Lito Aleniza. "By tapping social consciousness through this noble endeavor, we project more than 40,000 runners from all walks of life to lend a helping hand."

Ladies Cup tees off

KYTHE Foundation, whose mission is to provide psycho-social support to pediatric cancer patients and their families, will be the main beneficiary of the Manila Ladies Cup, a five-in-one golf tournament firing off Nov. 16 at Wack Wack's west course. The organizing Manila Lady Golfers Foundation Inc. put up the event last year to help raise funds for charities that will benefit women and children. WNCAA launches men's tilt

THE WOMEN'S National Collegiate Athletic Association (WNCAA) will launch its men's counterpart, the MNCAA, on Nov. 12 at the CEU gym. Participating schools are 1st season host Centro Escolar University, Angelicum, Chiang Kai Shek, Emilio Aguinaldo College, Immaculate Conception Academy Cavite, Lourdes-Quezon City, Siena College-Quezon City, University of the Assumption Pampanga, University of Asia & the Pacific and Rizal Technological University.

3 undefeated in NCA

THE FINAL derby of the NCA's National 8-Stag Championship of the 2004 NCA Stag Wars promises to be a huge affair. If the first day is any indication, The Oct 28 tilt produced only three undefeated entries—Winning Time Jobo-B of Lito Orillaza, PPBG San Pablo Makisig of Boy Rojo and Jima For JVL SMRC-I of Joe Laureno—out of 35 listed.

Bakbakan 8 stag elims

THE ELIMINATOR rounds of Bakbakan: National 8 Stag derby of the National Federation of Gametowl Breeders continue as breeders try to qualify for the championship next month. On Nov. 6 and 8, 130 breeders from the Luzon Gametowl Breeders Association will hold their elimination round at the Roligon Mega Cockpit. The first day is exclusive to LGBA members, while the Nov. 8 tilt will accept stage banded by NGBA, GF BAN, PAGBA, MIGBA and CVGBA.

San Carlos tops under-14 meet

JAY R Baguio, most valuable player in the recent Negros Occidental-leg of the Red Ribbon Football Fiesta, scored in the 58th minute to seal San Carlos City Football Club's 2-1 victory over FC de Pontevedra in the final of the Under-14 tournament.

San Carlos took a 19th minute lead on a strike by Ryan Lerio, but Pontevedra's Kevin Bonilla struck in the 36th to tie the count at the break.

Don Bosco Technical Institute took the bronze with a 2-1 win over FC de Pontevedra's 'B' team.

The final was staged at the West Negros College pitch in Bacolod and was graced by Mari Mendezona, secretary general of the Negros Occidental Football Association and Guila Malaga, Red Ribbon Bakeshop's Bacolod manager.

Badminton boom will still grow bigger, says coach Oreta

By Marc Anthony Reyes

COURTS are sprouting like mushrooms on a rainy day. Tournaments are cropping up in every converted warehouse. People go around walking with the latest gear and in the latest fashion.

Butch Oreta has seen this all before. It's a badminton boom still in its infancy.

The national coach said the craze that has hit the country is similar to the one that struck Chinese Taipei in the early '90s.

"Back then, everywhere you go there are badminton courts, and people dropped ping pong [paddles] for badminton rackets," said Oreta.

But unlike sporting fads that cool off after hitting a high—billiards being a good example—Oreta believes badminton's peak, like in Chinese Taipei, is still 10 years away.

"I believe this will also happen here in the country for two reasons," he explained.

First, badminton is one sport where Asians have a big chance of winning internationally. In fact, the best players in the world are mostly Indonesians, Malaysians, Chinese and Koreans.

So far, the country has only sent one player in the Olympics—former PSC commissioner Weena Lim. And in last year's SEA Games in Vietnam, the country won just a single bronze courtesy of siblings Kennievic and Kennie Asuncion.

But Oreta envisions bigger things.

"I have seen 12-year-olds play at a level of 16 to 18 years olds during my time here (Rizal Memorial Badminton Hall). There will surely come a time when the Filipinos can also excel in international stage," said Oreta. "The problem is, we have to carve a niche in Asian level first to conquer the world."

The other reason why Oreta expects the badminton fad to pick up steam is that it is easy to learn.

Still, Oreta cautioned aspiring players who choose to make do without the basics and rely on self-learned skills and sheer hours spent in the courts.

"When you don't learn the basics, you are likely to get bad habits that would be very hard to unlearn," said Oreta.

Badminton's popularity has its drawbacks. Oreta said rampant crimes are committed inside badminton courts, which go unreported for fear of getting bad press.

Oreta said police authorities, particularly Gen. Edgardo Aglipay, who happens to be the secretary general of the Philippine Badminton Association, have encouraged court owners to report armed robbery in their courts so measures can be taken.

He said badminton courts, which are mostly remodeled warehouses, should have an enclosed security box inaccessible to would-be holduppers.

"That way, security guards can call police without being harmed," said Oreta. "There are a few badminton courts in Metro Manila that have an enclosed box in the middle of the court."

But other than that, badminton—the sport of choice for a country looking for enjoyable ways to stay fit and have fun—is on a healthy rise to the top.

TIMOTHY Mark the baby, with proud dad Mark Gil

The newest Eigenmann

By Leah C. Salterio
Contributor

HIS GOOD looks alone are enough to guarantee for him a place in Philippine entertainment. But good looks are not all there is to Sid Lucero. His formidable lineage also entitles him to a special place in show biz.

The 21-year-old Sid, from the third generation of actors from the venerable Eigenmann clan, is a chip off the old block. His paternal grandfather, Eddie Mesa, was once known as the Elvis Presley of the Philippines. His grandmother on the same side is noted character actress Rosemarie Gil. And his father is Mark Gil, one of the most admired actors in Philippine cinema.

But rather than depend on his more popular relatives, Sid—real name, Timothy Mark Eigenmann—wants to be known for his own merits. It was the young man himself, in fact, who insisted on taking a screen name after he decided to follow in the big footsteps of his famous father.

The budding actor and his manager, Ricky Gallardo of The Talent Factory, picked the name Sid Lucero, which happens to be the name of Mark's character in Mike de Leon's classic film, "Batch '81." It was in that landmark movie that Mark met fashion and commercial model Bing Pimentel (remember her in the Coca-Cola TV ad?), who would give birth to Timothy Mark, who would become today's Sid Lucero.

"All of my cousins and even my half-brother Gabby, who are all in show biz, are using Eigenmann," Sid points out. "So, I decided to use a different name. Tito Ricky and I were in the car and we were thinking of a name. When he asked me, Did you watch 'Batch '81?' Then I told him, 'Yun na!' That was how my screen name came about."

6 months old

Ricky, who also manages the show biz careers of Bituin Escalante, Franco Laurel, Tex Or-

SID LUCERO the young man, who continues to make his father proud doñez, Ian Veneracion, Chad Borja, Simon Ibarra and AJ Eigenmann, recalls the first time he saw Timothy was when the boy was only 6 months old. At that time, Mark had won the Urian best supporting actor trophy for his performance in Lino Brocka's "Pahpat-lipat, Papalit-palit."

Recalls Ricky, "Mark said, 'Come here, Ricky. I want you to look at my boy.' Inside the room was Sid in a crib beside Mark's Urian trophy. That same year, Mark had also won a best actor nomination from the Urian for 'Batch '81.' The next time I saw Sid, he was already in third year high school."

When Mark put up a bar in Dasmaguere City in 2000, Ricky attended the opening with Gina Alajar, Mark's sister-in-law who is married to Michael de Mesa. Ricky saw Sid again. "At that time, he was with the varsity swimming team of Ateneo and we joked about his joining show biz," Ricky says. "It all started with a joke."

IGO the character with Judy Ann Santos in "Krystala"

Sid has already done nearly half a dozen advertisements for Globe, Jack n' Jill Chippy, BPI Express Cash and Shakey's. Two years ago, he started going with his dad to the latter's tapings, shootings and other show biz appointments.

Sid formally entered show biz last year and made his TV acting debut in GMA 7's short-lived drama series, "Hanggang Kailan." Recently, however, he moved to ABS-CBN, where he is now in the primetime soap, "Krystala." Sid plays Igo, one of the three love interests of Judy Ann Santos, who plays the title role.

Who he admires

"Being in show biz is like a dream," Sid says. "One moment you're here and the next moment you're in another place—and you don't exactly remember how you got from one place to the other."

Sid insists he wants to be known as a good actor like his dad. "My dad is not really my idol," he says, "but he is really good. I like him best in 'Kd, Huwag Kang Susuko.' He is very good when he's bad in his movies."

"I also admire Pen Medina and Ronnie Lazaro. I had a scene with Ronnie in 'Krystala' and at first I was scared of him because I know he's really a good actor."

"For me, it's not really the money that's important," he adds. "It's the product that comes after the work."

Although the pressure of living up to his illustrious family name exists, Sid seems undaunted. "This is the career path I chose," he declares. "It's flattering when people refer to me as 'the son of Mark Gil,' but I'll work hard to move away from the shadow of my dad. I know it's hard and it may not be smooth-sailing all the way, but I'm ready for it."

He already sounds like a true Eigenmann.

Rebekah: Kuh Ledesma's choice

By Remy Umerez
Contributor

WHEN Kuh Ledesma sat as a judge for the 2002 "Star Quest," she was impressed with runner-up Lhey Bella, whose voice she found "powerful."

The contestant from Cavite did not win the coveted title, but came away with Kuh's express approval. After the show, the singer approached Lhey and offered to manage the girl under her own Headline Concepts. "You're really good," Ledesma said. "And you project well."

When she signed a contract with Headline, Lhey was renamed Rebekah—Hebrew for "captivating."

According to Rebekah, she got her love for singing from her mother. "She sings during weddings, anniversary parties, even in wakes," she said in Filipino. "Our favorites are 'Gaano Kita Kamahal' and Barbra Streisand's 'Evergreen.' At 14, I was already singing with a band called City Sounds."

Rebekah has guested in concerts that Kuh produced. In one of the shows, they even sang a duet. It was a defining moment for the young performer. She soon became a favorite for corporate engagements.

Role model

"Ma'am Kuh taught me everything she knows," Rebekah said. "She's been like an elder sister to me. When she criticizes me, she does it in such a way that I don't feel offended. She wants me to know by heart what professionalism means. She is strict and a disciplinarian, but for the right reasons. I know she only wants me to improve."

Rebekah, now 22, recently auditioned for Floyd Evangelista of E-Real Records, a new company owned by Filipinos but based in the United States.

"CAPTIVATING." Formerly known as Lhey Bella flew in from Poway, California, on Kuh's invitation just to listen to Rebekah.

The young singer recalls how the audition went: "I strummed the guitar and sang 'Isang Labi.' Then I did 'Hands to Heaven' and 'Almost Over You.' I think they liked what they heard, because they want to bring me to the U.S."

Meanwhile, work has begun on her debut album, which will mark yet another phase in her singing career. The carrier cut, "Stop," which she herself wrote, will soon be played on radio. The album will also feature four original songs by R&B star Keith Martin, known for his big hit, "Because of You."

Christmas wish

Year after year, Rebekah makes a wish at Christmastime.

"I used to pray that my parents [who are separated] would get back together. But I've stopped, seeing it's not even remotely possible. Now I'm just focusing on my career. And so my wish this year is for my album to serve as my calling card when I go to the States. E-Real has so much faith in me, I want to be able to rise to the challenge."

In November, for three consecutive Fridays, Rebekah will perform at the Republic of Malate.

ENTERTAINMENT

Focus on three new directors

THUS far, most of the Asian directors who have made it big in the US films are of Chinese descent: Ang Lee, Zhang Yimou, Wong Kar-Wai, etc.

With the success of "The Grudge," however, Japanese filmmaker Takashi Shimizu bids fair to join their exclusive club.

"The Grudge" is currently topping the US box office, riding high on the popularity of Asian horror movies. Shimizu has added his unique touch to the evolving genre by opting to show ghosts, not as specters, but in a more realistic fashion.

The filmmaker is also known for his relentless pacing and great sense of style. Producer Sam Raimi gushes, "He never leaves you any time to catch your breath. He has elevated the genre to a new level."

When Shimizu was tapped to meg the American version of his original Japanese film, he was insecure about having to work with American actors, and according to Hollywood's way of doing things.

But he was heartened when he was given creative freedom, and it was pointed out that the US version's bigger budget would enable him to achieve the special effects that he hadn't been able to pay for in his movie's original version.

As for the US stars, Shimizu didn't get any sass from them. In fact, lead players Sarah Michelle Gellar and Bill Pullman were profuse in their praise for their director's mastery of his craft, and grateful for the unusual treat of shooting the movie in Japan.

In "The Grudge," Gellar plays an American student in Tokyo who's terrorized by a violent spirit lingering in a house with an extreme bloody history.

Tim Story is another relatively new filmmaker whose movie is generating box-office buzz—but in the field of zany comedy. His new movie, "Taxi," follows up on the success of his first major feature film, the 2002 comedy smash hit, "Barbershop."

"Taxi" is the American remake of a blockbuster French film, and making it was a joy for Story. In the original film, the lead character was a male taxi driver named Daniel.

While attempting to stay true to the protagonist's obsession with speed, Story tweaked the original concept and flipped the lead character's gender, so he could cast Queen Latifah in the colorful role.

For the role of Washburn, Story needed a young comedian who was a good enough actor to play an undercover police officer. He found exactly the right talent in Jimmy Fallon, one of the hot young comics on TV's "Saturday Night Live," who plays his first movie lead role in "Taxi."

In the film, while Queen Latifah fearlessly revs her way through the streets of New York in her souped-up cab, Fallon clumsily chases a gang of robbers, which leaves him carless and uncensored.

To prove his superiors wrong, he decides to take Latifah's taxi to nail the robbers.

For his part, director Paul McGuigan was able to get Josh Hartnett to star in his new movie, "Wicker Park," because Hartnett was a fan of McGuigan's previous film, "Gangster No. 1."

Once he started shooting for "Wicker Park," Hartnett became even more of a fan because he loved McGuigan's dextrous use of recurring motifs and themes in his new psychological thriller.

In the film, Hartnett's character is obsessed with the haunting memory of a girlfriend who mysteriously disappeared from his life two years ago.

Unable to get her out of his mind—and heart—Hartnett starts looking for the missing woman. His search leads him deeper into the mystery, as the film moves back and forth in time, revealing its story from different perspectives.

Despite these dark elements, McGuigan sees "Wicker Park" as a film about possibilities. He shares, "What appealed to me was its theme of passion, and the belief that love conquers all. I think that's the sweetness of our movie: It is a story about the possibility of love finding a way in the most improbable circumstances."

"Wicker Park" also stars Diane Kruger, Rose Byrne and Matthew Lillard.

Tessa's talking! And so are Anton and, oh no, Johnny, too!

By Marinel R. Cruz

INQUIRER Lifestyle columnist and fashion iconoclast Tessa Prieto-Valdes swears that going into show business was never on her mind when she agreed to do a weekly magazine show on ABC 5.

"No, no, no!" she told INQUIRER Entertainment in an interview at her Forbes Park home. "Show business for me is very demanding. I can't commit to it because I'm so free-spirited. I don't want to be trapped in a box. If I'm not in the mood and I don't like to do something, I won't do it. I keep guesting in all these shows, but I don't want to get deep into this thing."

"On the other hand," added veteran TV host Johnny Litton, "show biz would be the next step for Anton and me. We want to be bold actors."

SHOW TIME

Very busy

Tessa, Johnny and Tatler Philippines editor Anton San Diego are hosting "Look Who's Talking," which premieres on Nov. 10 at 10:30 p.m. on ABC 5. The show is produced by KB Entertainment.

"I only agreed to do this show because I would be working with Johnny and Anton, and I won't be too pressured," said Tessa, who was two months pregnant with her third child at the time of the interview. "I'm actually so busy with what I'm doing that my kids are already complaining. I don't think I can do this alone. And besides, people might get bored if I keep talking and talking."

'How would you like a diamond with only one facet? A diamond shines better with many facets. This show brings that'

And talk Tessa did during the interview. Anton had to interrupt her so he could have his turn. "Tessa, me naman," said Anton, laughing.

"Sorry, Anton," Tessa said. "I accepted this show," said Anton, "because it's a challenge for me. I've been involved with magazines since 1998. I want to see how far I could go. But I made sure I understand the concept. So before we taped, we talked with the producer and the director. They shared their ideas with us and we gelled."

You are there

According to Anton, viewers will get a peek into everything that's happening in and out of the country through "Look Who's Talking." Among the interesting topics are the recent Manila visit of Princess Caroline of Monaco, Petron president Khalid D. Al-Faddagh's insight on oil prices and their impact on the economy, and the forthcoming Tatler Ball in Hong Kong.

"Not many people can go to these events, but when they watch us, it's as if they're there," explained Johnny. "Another example is the launch of the last episodes of the top-rating show 'Sex in the City' that was held recently at the Bellevue Hotel in Alabang."

"We have individual sections in the show," said Tessa. "It's more of a lifestyle show with a twist. We bring our own personalities to the show. I'm into belly dancing so we'll have features on that, as well as parties and fashion shows. Johnny will have one-on-one interviews with different personalities."

The show caters not only to the more privileged class, but to the masa as well, according to Johnny. "Through the show, the masa can share, if vicariously, in the events."

"I think both the masa and the rich would want to know more about the artistas," said Tessa. "We'll interview them, ask them what they are wearing, what party they are going to or who they are going out with. We'll also cover charitable events. There are so many people who don't know how to sort of channel their funds."

No take-tvos

The three hosts agreed that taping the show for the first time was not easy. Even Johnny, whom Tessa and Anton described as a TV expert, said he also had to adjust.

"I was learning just like them because 90 percent of my previous show, all 22 years of it, was aired live," Johnny said, referring to "Oh No It's Johnny."

"I was very intimidated by a lot of things," shared Anton. "We shot at the Shangri-La Mas and everyone was watching."

TALK TV, Johnny Litton, Tessa Prieto-Valdes and Anton San Diego host "Look Who's Talking."

STYLING BY KENNETH COLE

GRAND-SLAM actor Piolo Pascual (for "Dekada 70") is going to have a very merry Christmas

His mother, Amelia, 58, is coming home for good. After staying in the US for 15 years working in the medical field, she will now take care of Piolo's son, Iñigo, 7.

Piolo, who is a single dad, says it's hard to be working full-time and rearing an inquisitive and outgoing child. Father and son make it a must to spend Sundays together worshipping at the Victory Christian Fellowship Church in Pasig City.

Whenever he could, Piolo brought Iñigo to the taping of his teleserye, "Mangarap Ka," in Quiapo so the kid can see how his father works and understand his lifestyle.

After his telenovela ended, Piolo bagged the award for Outstanding Lead Actor in a Drama Series from the Entertainment Press Awards. A movie directed by Gilbert Perez, with whom Piolo worked in last year's "Kahit Isang Saglit," is in production. Piolo stars in it with Bea Alonzo. Piolo is also working on his third music album with composer Louie Ocampo. "Piolo Sings Louie" will be released on Valentine 2005.

Concert tours? Piolo left last week with the rest of the Humks to perform in shows in Australia. Nov. 7, he performs in Hong Kong. In December, he has four more shows in the United States.

In this pictorial, Piolo models his favorite casual clothing brand, Kenneth Cole, whose denim styling and easy-to-travel looks the actor loves.

'Indiana Jones,' Part IV, is coming

LOS ANGELES—Hollywood heavyweights Steven Spielberg and George Lucas have hired a high-profile movie writer to pen a new script for a fourth installment of the "Indiana Jones" adventure series, the trade magazine Variety reported.

DID YOU KNOW...

Spielberg and Lucas, who directed and produced the successful movies, agreed a decade ago with star Harrison Ford that all three would have to agree on a script for the next movie about the adventurous archaeologist.

After working unsuccessfully with several writers the trio settled on Jeff Nathanson, who wrote the script of "Catch Me If You Can" starring Leonardo di Caprio, and co-scripted the Tom Hanks movie "The Terminal," both directed by Spielberg.

Nathanson also penned the script for the successful Jackie Chan-Chris Tucker "Rush Hour" action comedies.

The project seemed dead in February when Paramount Pictures canceled a mid-year production start because a script by Frank Darabont—whose writing credits include several episodes of the "Young Indiana Jones" television series as well as the upcoming "Fahrenheit 451"—was not unanimously approved by the trio, according to Variety.

Once Spielberg, Lucas and Ford agree on a script it still unclear how soon the movie will begin filming.

Spielberg, who is completing "War of the Worlds" with Tom Cruise, plans to focus on a movie about the aftermath of the 1972 Munich Olympics terror attacks, according to Variety.

Lucas is focused on completing the third "Star Wars" movie, while Ford is preparing to star in a thriller titled "The Wrong Element," followed by a drama about a crisis on an international space station titled "Godspeed."

The last "Indiana Jones" movie, the third in the series, came out in 1989.

FIRST-TIMERS Tessa and Anton are very good, according to TV veteran Johnny.

JOSEPH AGACAO

Tessa's talking! And so are Anton and, oh no, Johnny, too!

"Don't let him kid you," Johnny said. "Tessa and he were very good. The criterion is always simple when you're taping—cut, do it again, cut, do it again. With them, there were no cuts. No take-twos. For first-timers, Anton and Tessa were excellent."

"The pilot really takes longer to tape," said Tessa. "It's our first time to tape together but I can see that we're just going to breeze through it next time."

Energized by the young

For Johnny, his love for television made him say yes to hosting "Look Who's Talking."

"[Working for] television is a form of relaxation for me," he said. "At the same time, I like working with young people. They always energize you. I also look at it as a way of sharing experiences with people who, for whatever reason, can't be with us.

"People would say 'why are you showing these things in this time of economic crisis?' We're showing these because we want to inspire people, to reach out, and teach them not to live with their palms always open."

With him, Tessa and Anton as hosts, Johnny said, "Look Who's Talking" is a most unusual show. "It brings you the different facets of lifestyles, from the eyes of the young, the unusual, the experienced," he said.

"How would you like a diamond with only one facet?" he added. "A diamond shines better with many facets. This show brings that. We get serious, we joke around, we're artistic, we're creative. We are, with all due respect, quite a formidable team."

Regine and Zsa Zsa: Applause, not censure

THIS week I bumped into Ma. Consoliza Laguardia and somehow my runaway tongue had to bring up the gowns of Regine Velasquez and Zsa Zsa Padilla.

See, it has bothered me no end that Mrs. Laguardia, chief censor of the land, should actually take offense at the fashion choices of performing artists. I caught her on TV saying this about necklines: "Okay yung hanggang dito [fingers pointing to two inches below collarbone] pero wag naman yong ganito [fingers going one inch lower]."

In other words, a neckline for church.

My, the censors chief has added fashion critic—no, fashion police—to her job description! And her personal taste would dictate that Regine and Zsa Zsa's collars should be like hers.

I don't understand. Have we just become the Stepford Wives here? Or, while I was sleeping, did the entire female population sign up for a cofradia of some sort?

But since Mrs. Laguardia seems like a nice woman who probably means well, and whose only fault may be that she talked when she should have thought, I brought up the gowns thing.

In reply, the censors chief said she never "reprimanded," she had simply "reminded," she'd issued no memos, she'd simply let fall a small remark to the press.

In turn, I said that nothing she says can ever be just a "reminder"; that each time she speaks, her words carry with them the full weight of her position, that for as long as she remains head of the Movie and Television Review and Classification Board, whatever she lets fall to the press will have a ripple effect; and that she will send the industry scurrying in all directions in an attempt to appease her.

To that she replied with a sheepish smile which, I figured, was meant to show modesty about all the fuss made over her smallest remarks. But, I daresay, all she managed to do was play coy. For within that briefest of time at the curb, I knew for certain that she understood the power of her position perfectly.

Beyond instinct, there are the facts.

Mrs. Laguardia handed her resignation letter as a matter of courtesy, and for a while it looked to have been accepted by the President, or at least the

JUICE

Jo-Ann Q. Maglipon

President's official signature on the letter must've been seen by the Palace subalterns who announced it, only this was followed by contrary noise from outside, pushing the Palace spokesperson to say somebody below flubbed it, until finally Mrs. Laguardia ended up holding on to a second term as censors chief.

Pray, if your position held no real power, would you even want it a second time around?

What's the crime?

What is with those gowns anyway? There is no decency issue here. Those gowns are glamorous, not scandalous; provocative, not exhibitionist; innovative, not hedonistic. And given the bodies they are draped on, they are extremely pleasing to the sight.

Of course, one person's pleasure is someone else's fright night. But that's precisely why we fight tyrannies, right? We want the plurality, and we want it even in fashion!

As I always say, you can have your "Sound of Music," but leave me alone with my "Addams Family."

The censors chief has also said she just wants to avoid having accidental breast exposures on TV. Good for her.

But why should her fear of an accident reduce the rest of us adults to a wardrobe of uptight collars and sackcloth?

Why should her paranoia over a few publicity-hungry girls dictate a whole new line of constipated dressing?

Sure, a censor's "reminder" may not have the force of law, but if it has the same effect, then a censor had better stop taunting artists with it.

Already, Zsa Zsa has said she would look over her just-finished gowns and have them redone. And Regine has said the censors' chief had the right to interfere but wanted to know why just them?

On both counts, I disagree with the women.

If Zsa Zsa can carry those slinky gowns, if she doesn't see anything lewd about them, if Dolphy finds them beautiful on her—why in the world should she have them redone?

She has broken no law!

If Regine can perform like a songbird in necklines that plunge and backs that drop to there—why ever should she shift to safe and prissy costumes?

It's her body, it's her choice.

Otherwise, what's next?

More small "reminders" from the chair—that the artist's hair is too vampy, the earrings too chunky, the legs too shiny, the nails too painted, the gums too exposed! And then what? Oh, the song protests too much, the play is too libertine, the novel too angry!

Censorship, remember, is a slippery slide.

Defying the acceptable

In the end, what is worrisome is not that someone should want to be MTRCB chair—one can still do some good there, I should think—but that that someone should have so little understanding of artists.

Artists—like Regine and Zsa Zsa—are in our midst precisely to defy the common and the acceptable and to try the untried, not just in song, but in everything, including matters of beauty and fashion.

That's the way any society moves forward.

If these artists simply rode the tide, they wouldn't be the wondrous performers they are and we wouldn't be the lucky audience we are. And we'd be stuck.

Just look at them!

They mold themselves to the mood and theme of whatever the stage demands, they transport us to another world where everyone is gay and kind and only good feelings abound, they weave the magic that gives us the ethereal and the substantial, all at once.

That is entertainment and there are artists!

And beyond that, look at their discipline!

They bend their bodies to their will. They deny themselves rich food. They undergo surgery. They give up socials. They spend big money to stay in top form. They do what it takes to be stars in a society that, unfortunately, demands great looks even in artists as good as they.

So please, can our well-meaning censors just leave them alone? Please.

THE DIVINE Diva and the Songbird give audiences great joy; our censors should return the favor by not giving them grief.

Bernie Fineza hooked on drugs, says Parsons

Don't believe what Sonny says, he wants to ruin everyone, says Kirby's dad

FRIEND AND BROTHER Sonny claims he knows how Bernie treats his family.

By Nini Valera

TELLING a tale of despair and excesses, former Hagibis leader Sonny Parsons described Bernie Fineza, one of the members of the Village People-type group, as a "boy in a man's body."

A 15-year-old finalist in the "StarStruck" talent search, Kirby de Jesus, had accused Bernie, his father, of abandoning the family when the boy was 5 years old.

Parsons, 46, told INQUIRER Entertainment last week that Bernie had been hooked on drugs since they first met in 1979.

"I knew it from the start," said Sonny. "Marijuana, Mogadon. That's why we didn't get along. I would rather go to the gym [than take drugs]."

"I told him to reform," Sonny claimed, "and he said he would. But he always went back [to his old ways]. Among us [in Hagibis], Bernie became the closest to me. I know all of them, and it's only Bernie who went wayward."

Bernie earlier denied to INQUIRER Entertainment that he is still into drugs.

"Don't believe what Sonny says," Bernie said. "He's all BS. He wants to ruin everybody."

Rehab attempts

Bernie also lacked discipline, Sonny said.

"Show business is not permanent," Sonny said. "You're only good up to your last show. What I mean is... save, save for the rainy days. But Bernie never saved."

"I think it's [because of] his addiction, and his lifestyle," Sonny added. "He spends more than what he earns. He goes out every night, spends his money [on] drinks, shabu, until nothing was left. He never denied being into drugs. He was always into drugs."

Three times, Sonny attempted to have Bernie rehabilitated, but nothing happened, said Sonny.

"Ang tanda na natin, kailangan ko pa ba siyang pagsabihan? [We're old enough. Did I have to tell him what to do?]," Sonny said. "You [should] know what's right, so do it."

In 2001, when Hagibis reunited and released one album under Star Records, Sonny thought Bernie would recover from his setbacks. The group was popular again, and money from their concerts was pouring in. Sonny said he was able to earn about P2.9 million that year from shows alone.

"Our manager, Malou Borja, even came up with the idea of putting Bernie's money in the bank instead of giving it to him," Sonny recalled. "He must have accumulated about half a million during that time. But Bernie spent his money little by little, until one day it was all gone."

"I feel sad because Bernie is a very talented person as far as music is concerned. Michael Bolton yan. I even told him, 'Boy, diyan ka sa boses mo yayaman [Your voice could make you rich].'"

Nice house

When Hagibis split up in the '80s, Sonny became an actor, director and a politician. The other members went on to other careers. But Bernie was left behind, according to Sonny.

"He went to Japan as a singer daw," he said. "He became a hosto [male guest relations officer]."

Sonny said Bernie had money when he returned from Japan. That was also the time that he was living with Malta de Jesus, mother of Kirby, the "StarStruck" finalist.

"They had a house in Calocan," said Sonny. "Maganda [A nice house]. But when the money was all gone, they split up."

"It's ironic," Sonny added. "When we have children, we know we're supposed to be responsible for our children. But coming from the child himself, that his father neglected him, we'd believe that was what really happened."

Sonny claimed he saw how Bernie had treated his family. He described Bernie's relationship to his family as, "Ni-ha, ni-ha, nothing."

Beaten up

But his friendship with Bernie survived, Sonny claimed. When he was already an actor, Sonny would pass on roles to Bernie, he said.

'He's not yet hopeless but he should be a man and face the world'

"He would call me to thank me," said Sonny. "He had money again. But what did he do? In one shooting, the staff beat him up. Nayayabangan sa kanya [They found him arrogant]. He still thought he was Hagibis, and therefore a star."

Sonny admitted that he had also gone through that phase, but had overcome the delusion.

"You should learn to accept that you've reached your peak, and learn to face your downfall," he reflected.

The last movie Sonny made was "Bala Para Sa Katarungan," which he produced, directed and starred in, for Regal Films in 2000.

"When action movies were no longer in vogue, I shifted to directing," said Sonny. "I studied first in Boston."

Like Hagibis, Sonny's movie career is now "at a standstill." But he still produces occasionally—Thursdays at Hobbit House in Ermita—and has opened a property in Antipolo, which he turned into an entertainment venue, calling it Hobbit East. The place will open third week of November.

Paranoid

But Sonny still has time for his friend Bernie, whom he last saw about three months ago.

"I was jamming with Freddie Aguilar at Hobbit House," recalled Sonny. "Bernie came and asked for money. Freddie gave him a thousand. Later, I gave Freddie P500 as my share. It's natural for Bernie to come to us for money. He said he needs money to buy his medicines. He's diabetic, and he has high blood pressure.

"Lately, I noticed that he has also become paranoid. When he's like that, you should give him what he asks for. Otherwise, he would say nasty things to you. But it's not all the time that I have money on me."

But Sonny claimed that he could not turn his back on Bernie.

"He's my brother," he said. "Sometimes, I just get fed up with him. He always wanted to take things easy, and that's not possible."

"No, Bernie's not yet hopeless," Sonny added. "But he should be a man and face the world."

ABANDONED at 5, "StarStruck" finalist Kirby de Jesus says he's happy with his stepfather.

The best actress race appears wide open with several veteran leading ladies vying for the Oscar, but O'Neil noted that in recent years Oscar voters have favored younger actresses whom he called Hollywood's "babe du jour."

That title could belong to 26-year-old French actress Audrey Tautou for "A Very Long Engagement," Zhang Ziyi, 25, in the Chinese film "House of Flying Daggers" or last year's "Lost in Translation" breakout star, Scarlett Johansson, 19, in "A Love Song for Bobby Long."

Among the veterans are Annette Bening as a 1930s stage diva in "Being Julia," Britain's Imelda Staunton as an abortionist in "Vera Drake," Julia Roberts in "Closer," Kate Winslet in "Finding Neverland," Cate Blanchett for "Aviator" and Laura Linney in independent film "p.s." and in "Kinsey."

Among the yet-to-be released movies that experts think could be competing for best picture Oscars are Oliver Stone's "Alexander" about the conqueror, James L. Brooks' tale of modern domesticity "Spanglish," Wes Anderson's offbeat "The Life Aquatic with Steve Zissou" and Joel Schumacher's "The Phantom of the Opera."

Schumacher said the musical movie goes far deeper into the characters than the stage production on which it is based, and the film sets are elaborate and costumes extravagant.

"Part of what we owe the audience is the shameless and swooning glamour of Paris in the 1870s," Schumacher said.

Shameless? Swooning? Sounds like Hollywood at Oscar time.

SHOO-IN. Jamie Foxx is expected to be nominated for playing the legendary singer.

LOS ANGELES—When the movie "Ray," about legendary singer Ray Charles, hits US theaters this week, the battle for Oscars nominations will take center stage as well.

"Ray" is the first of the award season's major movies to roll into theaters backed by a big campaign for the film industry's top honors, the Academy Awards, which are handed out in February.

Early buzz is that comic actor Jamie Foxx is a shoo-in for a best actor nomination for playing the musician who overcame blindness, heroin addiction and poverty to lay the foundation of soul music and become one of America's most beloved entertainers.

Oscar handicappers say they expect the best actor race to be the most competitive. But for now, all the talk is mere speculation because as the movies play over the next four months, this year's contest will change many times.

"This is the fun part of the race, speculating wildly," said Tom O'Neil, host of award show tracker GoldDerby.com.

This week, Foxx wins the attention. In a recent interview, he said he sees his role as a culmination not only of years of stand-up comedy and acting but also learning to play piano and singing in gospel choirs.

"If I hadn't taken piano, I couldn't have done the 96 music cues. If I hadn't been a musician, I couldn't have played the songs. If I hadn't had the acting... you wouldn't get to Ray Charles, and not just the singer, but the man," he said.

Most of "Ray" covers the decades in which Charles rose to fame with hits like "I Got a Woman" and "Hit the Road Jack." He crisscrossed genres from jazz and rhythm and blues to country and western and he mixed sexual lyrics with a gospel sound.

Charles also abused drugs and kept a string of mistresses, and "Ray" does not shy away from his dark side.

Voters at the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences, which awards the Oscars, have recently favored unflinching performances like last year's best actress award winner Charlize Theron, who played a serial killer in "Monster."

That should help Foxx's position. But other actors in biographical films figure into the competition including Liam Neeson as sex researcher Alfred Kinsey in "Kinsey" and Mexico's Gael Garcia Bernal playing a young Che Guevara in "The Motorcycle Diaries."

Also touted as possible nominees are Leonardo DiCaprio playing young Howard Hughes in "The Aviator," and Johnny Depp playing "Peter Pan" creator J.M. Barrie in "Finding Neverland." Both are backed by Oscar powerhouse Miramax Films and its boss, Harvey Weinstein.

Also on the early lists are Jude Law in the upcoming thriller "Closer," Kevin Bacon in "The Woodsman," Don Cheadle for "Hotel Rwanda," Paul Giamatti in "Sideways," Javier Bardem for "The Sea Inside" and Christian Bale in "The Machinist."

Dad and lola gave him ingredients for success

By Margie Quimpo-Espino

IN THE Pedro family, the boys had nowhere else to go but into business.

So to business went Cecilio K. Pedro, who eventually made a name for himself for putting out Hapee toothpaste, the first to be manufactured by a Filipino company.

Pedro competed in an arena where the players were multinationals with huge cash boxes for advertising.

He, on the other hand, was just a small entrepreneur who dared to dream big.

Pedro says he learned the business at the feet of his father, who was a part owner of the company that sold Birch Tree milk.

FIRST JOB

It was from him that he learned the value of discipline.

"He led by example. He would be at work by 8 a.m. and come home at 7:30," recalls Pedro of his dad's routine.

He combined that with the Christian values handed down by his grandmother to become the businessman he is today.

Pedro says his father did not ask him to work in the family business, as many Chinese are wont to do.

Pedro instead went on the route to self-employment. But his father supported him.

He started when he was in high school at the Hope Christian High School in the late '60s.

He borrowed a few hundred pesos from his father to buy a box of ballpens, which he sold to his classmates.

It did not take long for him to lose his money and goods, because he sold on credit. Nobody paid him back.

That experience taught him an important lesson: "Credit is good but I need cash."

He shelved his entrepreneurial visions and focused on his studies, eventually getting a degree in management from the Ateneo de Manila University.

Unfazed by his first failure, he went into business once more, setting up a hardware store along Alonzo Street, Manila with a classmate.

Competition was so tough that the hardware had to offer long repayment periods, just to make a sale.

This put a strain on their finances, thus, they decided to shift to manufacturing in the late '70s.

He and a couple of friends went to Japan to look for opportunities, and came upon a company selling cheap equipment.

The equipment made aluminum tubes used by toothpaste makers at the time.

He believed in the prospects enough that he borrowed P50,000 from his parents to buy the equipment.

Thus, on Feb. 14, 1977, Aluminum Container Inc. was born. For one year, it had no business.

The time was spent knocking on the doors of multinationals offering their facilities.

These included the Philippine Refining Co., now called Unilever and Colgate-Palmolive Phils.

PEDRO does not want his only son to work in his business as it is better for the young Pedro to widen his horizons and experiences outside first.

"For one year we had no business. Every week I was talking to their purchaser and packaging development officers," Pedro recalls.

Finally, he was given a small order. And the orders grew from there.

"It's really like that in business. Kailangan matiyaga ka (You have to persevere)," he notes.

In 1981, his partner decided to pursue other interests but Pedro continued on with the company. Aluminum Container did well for almost 10 years but in 1986, one corporate decision ended a decade of Pedro's hard work.

The multinational firm decided to stop using aluminum tubes and shifted to laminated plastic tubes.

With 90 percent of their business centered on toothpaste, and with loss of aluminum tubes left in their hands, Pedro had no choice but to close shop in early 1986.

For almost two years, Pedro's factory was closed.

"I was 33 years old and I was planning my life. I recalled the story of the founder of Colgate who was a Christian and he was selling toothpaste," he says.

The Colgate founder was giving 90 percent of his earnings for tithing.

A Christian since he was young, Pedro says he prayed and asked if this was what God wanted.

SM's Tessie Sy makes Fortune's list of most powerful women

TERESITA Sy, eldest daughter of tycoon Henry Sy, lands Fortune Magazine's list of 50 most powerful women in business outside the US, for the second consecutive year.

Sy first landed the list last year where she ranked No. 45. This year she fell two notches to No. 47.

She is the sole Filipina on the list and one of only four from Southeast Asia. The three others from the region are from Singapore.

The write-up on Sy states she "may not share her father Henry's taste for loud Hawaiian shirts, but she's proving that her skill in the boardroom at family empire SM Prime Holdings is at least the equal of her wily octogenarian dad. With its 18 malls across the archipelago, SM Prime, under Sy's hand, seems to keep on growing. Profits this year are expected to top $80 million, on revenue of $2 billion, fueled by a resurgent Filipino economy and Sy's addition of two more malls to the portfolio. Next year's goal: the company's biggest expansion yet—three more complexes, including one that will become the group's flagship, the 4.2 million-square-foot Mail of Asia." (Margie Q. Espino)

The list is featured in the Oct. 25 issue of Fortune. At the top post is Anne Lauvergeon, who chairs Areva, the world's largest nuclear power company. She ranked No. 3 last year.

SM GROUP of companies president Teresita Sy Coson

At the No. 2 spot is Xie Qihua, chair and president of Shanghai Baosteel Group, who ranked No. 16 last year.

No. 3 is Marjorie Scardino, CEO of Pearson, who ranked No. 1 last year.

Former world banker now banks on organic vinegar

By Emir Emamo Gamis
PDI Southern Luzon Bureau

THANKS to the fame of the virgin coconut oil (VCO), the coconut is enjoying revitalized attention.

The VCO is said to have various health benefits ranging from skin and hair moisturizing to helping fight serious diseases like the Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome and the Severe Acute Respiratory Syndrome.

But for those who live in the province, the coconut has long been appreciated as a tree of life.

In the coconut-rich Bicol region, the half-mature coconut fruit, with meat still thin and soft, is believed to help increase a man's seminal volume.

The water inside the fruit is also helpful in cleansing the urinary tract.

Dying art

Also, farmers used to make a native drink from the coconut sap called "tuba," which is collected by clipping the stem that contains flowers and baby coconuts and putting a collection vessel, where the sap will run into.

Tuba used to be the staple in spees and social gatherings, but gathering it has now become an almost extinct art and the tuba-drinking culture has turned passé because of commercialized drinking.

Tuba can also be turned into vinegar as it can be put in an earthen jar and be naturally fermented.

For Linda Corsiga, owner of Sorsogon Food Enterprises, makers of Lola Conching coco nectar organic vinegar, the tuba and the vinegar derived from it have been part of her life.

Her mother, Lola Conching, now 83, used to serve freshly gathered tuba as an organic alcoholic drink in a small bar that they had in Bulan town, Sorsogon, their hometown, to help their father raise her and her four sisters.

Lola Conching would place the unconsumed tuba, which could no longer be drunk, in earthen jars and allow it to ferment naturally.

World of vinegar

"I lived in the world of vinegar. We were not used to using vinegar aside from the one from tuba," Corsiga says.

So when she retired in 1999 from the International Finance Corp., the private sector arm of the World Bank Group, she naturally gravitated toward a coconut-related business.

At first she enrolled in an apiculture course at the University of the Philippines in Los Baños and with the encouragement of one of her professors, who told her that the blossoms of the coconut tree are among the major sources of nectar, she had a honeybee farm with a total of 45 Australian honeybees.

Unfortunately, because she was not a hands-on beekeeper, all her honeybees died, along with her investments.

Organic

Finally, with the suggestion of her husband to convert their coconut farm from copra-making into organic vinegar-making, she ventured into a familiar turf: organic coconut vinegar making.

Corsiga also joined the Organic

SO FAR, foreigners have bought more organic vinegar than Filipinos.

Producer Trade Association (Opta) to learn more about the organic food industry and built a processing plant in San Rafael, Fabrica, Bulan.

The Bureau of Food and Drugs granted her a license to operate on Nov. 28, 2003.

Now she has turned a 10.6-hectare farm in Bulan into an organic agriculture and aquaculture farm.

Coconut trees are planted in about five hectares, where four tuba gatherers are assigned 30 coconut trees each to collect from.

"After gathering the tuba, we measure its sugar content in our factory; if it passes the required level, it is put in a food-grade container for a minimum of 45 to 60-day fermentation period," Corsiga says.

When the required acidity level is achieved, the vinegar is then filtered, pasteurized and then bottled depending on the customer's preference.

Product variety

Lola Conching's vinegar comes in variety: in 750 ml bottles, virgin (unfiltered/unpasteurized) sells for P80; with raw wild honey, P175; with lemon grass, P80; with garlic, P80; with chili and ginger, P85.

In 350 ml bottles, classic sells for P40; virgin, P50; with honey, P100; with lemon grass, P45; with garlic, P50; with chili and ginger, P60.

The vinegar can be used for cooking, salad dressing, dipping, marinating and pickling, and requires only a relatively small amount when used in flavoring.

Corsiga says she usually delivers her products in organic and health stores in Manila, either through consignment or cash basis.

One of her aims, she says, is to help reduce people's exposure to chemically treated food.

At the Green & Determined (G&D) Organic Haven located at 424-C E. Rodriguez Ave., Quezon City, the most popular is the classic variety because of its multipurpose use, according to the store's floor manager Jennifer Taghoy. Among the store customers' uses for the classic, Taghoy says, are as salad dressing, a way to spice up their "singing," as substitute for apple cider vinegar and for body detoxification.

"I have joined exhibits and trade shows, that one way or another, your product is being recognized in the market," Corsiga says.

Two BFAD-recognized laboratories, the Food Development Center of the National Food Authority and the SGS Philippines Inc., have found the vinegar's permanganate oxidation number high, indicative of the purity of the product.

Beta carotene, calcium, iron, sodium, phosphorus, magnesium and high potassium content were also found in the coco vinegar.

Foreign market

Ironically, foreigners noticed her product more than Filipinos did.

"It's difficult in the sense that not all Filipinos appreciate organic products yet. They would always compare your product with the non-organic ones. The tendency is for them to buy the cheaper ones," she pointed out.

But an American customer, who prefers unfiltered and unpasteurized coco vinegar, has ordered twice from her in June and September.

A prospective client, who is into Filipino food distribution in California, New York, New Jersey and San Francisco, has expressed interest in her products.

A prospective European client has asked for another laboratory test to confirm the presence of a certain component in the coco vinegar before making an order.

"I think we're still in infancy stage when it comes to the appreciation of organic foods. They're already advanced in the US, Europe and Japan," Corsiga noted.

"I'm still groping but my peers in Opta are telling me that I'm lucky because although I'm new (in the business) I have already exported my product," she added.

When asked why she did not venture into the VCO business trend, she said: "I have no plans of going into virgin coconut oil [business], they're already too many there. I would rather help develop other products that are vinegar-related."

After all, she says, she grew up in the world of vinegar.

Volunteerism keeps 'bayanihan' spirit alive

By Tina Arco-Dumiao

IN THE olden days, neighbors would happily hoist a family's bahay kubo on their shoulders and carry it to its new location in true bayanihan spirit.

No money is involved, just the community's wishes that the relocating family would do well in its new locale.

Companies and organizations strive to keep that bayanihan tradition alive by encouraging their employees to lend time, effort and a little money to laudable programs in the areas of environment, education, health and entrepreneurship.

One of these is HSBC Philippines, where volunteerism is a way of life for its employees, starting from CEO Warner Manning.

Saturday mornings, for instance, will find a group of HSBC employees telling stories, leading a science experiment or conducting math drills in HSBC's four READiscovery centers.

The READiscovery pilot sites at Kalawaan Elementary School, Libis Elementary School, Alabang Elementary School and Marcella Agoncillo Elementary School provide these public school children access to the latest in children's books, audio-visual equipment, computers, toys, puzzles and games to inspire creativity and shared learning.

By lending their time, HSBC employees maximize the benefits of the READiscovery centers for the good of the children. At the same time, they put a more useful twist to their Saturday mornings, which would have been otherwise spent just sleeping or going to some gimmick.

They not only help the public school students read and learn more, employees also go home after two to three hours feeling much better about themselves.

HSBC assistant vice president Laine Santana adds that as many as 40 HSBC employees also join in "diversity weekends," where they get the chance to involve themselves in projects of the Worldwide Fund for Nature, such as mangrove planting and the Dugong Research and Conservation Project.

They come at largely their own expense, but employees see it as an investment in knowledge in environmental preservation, one of the bank's pet causes.

Protecting the environment is also a major concern of the employees of oil refinery Petron Corp.

Every year, Petron employees take part in Kontra Kalat sa Dagat, the coastal cleanup of the shoreline of Bataan, where Petron's refinery is located.

Volunteers help pick up trash, serve as data recorders, assist the medical team or help disseminate information.

Employees also participate in reforestation efforts by buying mangrove seedlings and planting them in land and coastal habitats, in cooperation with national and local agencies.

Petron volunteers likewise join school and home visits to check up on the progress of some 1,000 indigent children in 90 schools that Petron helps through its Tulog Aral ng Petron program, in partnership with the Departments of Social Welfare and Education.

These are just three of 14 major company outreach programs, under the umbrella program of Volunteerism in Action, where volunteerism efforts are nurtured and recognized.

By putting company resources behind these programs through Petron Foundation, the company provides a venue for its employees to make a positive contribution to a better society.

And it's not only the employees and the communities that benefit from these efforts. The companies do, too, even if these are not immediately reflected on the bottom line.

A 2000 study conducted by the Philippine Business for Social Progress, in partnership with the City University of New York and the American Chamber Foundation, showed that employee volunteering builds teamwork skills among employees.

It also improves a company's relationships with the community; boosts employee morale; improves a company's public image and finally, helps create healthier communities.

Harnessing this employee power, however, takes deliberate and organized effort on the part of the company management and the employees themselves.

Unless it is espoused as a company policy, employee volunteer efforts will go the way of many other outreach programs—a mere flash in the pan.

ed him to be—the Colgate of the Philippines.

He knew at that time that the only way to get his factory going again was to make his own toothpaste.

Everybody else was shifting to laminated plastic.

He looked for a partner who could give him the technology to go into the toothpaste business.

First he talked to an American firm, then a Japanese. He was instead just given training and technology by Sun Star, the biggest toothbrush maker in Japan.

He created a new name for the company—Lamoyan which is the Chinese version of his grandmother's name—Irene Lim.

Fully aware of the strength and size of PRC and Colgate-Palmolive, Pedro's strategy was to compete by offering a cheaper alternative.

With regards to the distribution, Pedro had to go around himself and talked to distributors even in provinces.

With a limited budget for promotion, he spent wisely and sponsored the 1988 Philippine Olympic Team.

It created tremendous brand awareness which eventually translated into sales.

And since the brand was seen in an international venue, most everyone thought Hapee Toothpaste was made by a big company.

Sales of the product went up and Hapee Toothpaste became known.

Cecilio remains a dedicated and untiring businessman, even if Hapee is no longer a small-time brand.

He balances his career with his marriage to wife Irene, and his relationship with only son Joel, who would soon graduate with a Marketing degree from De La Salle University.

Deaf-mute 'haven'

One of the unique things about Lamoyan is it is one of the companies willing to employ disabled people, particularly the deaf-mute, who account for about 20 percent of Lamoyan's employees.

Pedro has always lived and abided by the words of the Lord: "Whatever you do to the least of my brothers, that you do unto me."

The deaf-mute are provided their own living quarters within the company compound.

Pedro was invited to join the Deaf Evangelical Alliance Foundation Inc. (DEAF) a few years ago. It is an organization established to take care of the needs of the deaf.

DEAF operates a school in Cavinti, Laguna where deaf people are given free college education.

In 1992, Pedro was chosen as DEAF chair. He proposes to establish more schools for the deaf in the next few years.

Religious upbringing

The words of God became an important part of Pedro's personality. He greatly owes it to his grandmother who inculcated religiosity in her family.

"I encounter difficulties because there are things that we can't do and there are things that we won't do. We always comply with the rules. I see to it that all our books are 'clean.' In fighting the giant companies, there are dirty tricks. But we won't resort to those. We would fight in an honest, legal way. Being a Christian is not easy; we are labeled—folks are stricter with us. We are tempted more. But we can also share the values in many ways—directly or indirectly. We can influence other businessmen through our own example," he says.

And how does he assess his status today? "We don't have to be very successful. Little successes will be enough because the Lord who made us a success in the first place will translate little success to a more humane basis. What is more important is to share values and contribute to the most needy."

DESPITE 388% TOLL HIKE

Lopez group claims motorists to benefit from NLEX

By Clarissa S. Batino

MOTORISTS are sure to grumble during the All Saints' Day break as they weave through heavy traffic along the clogged expressways.

Those regularly taking the North Luzon Expressway are likely to curse even more starting late this year or early next year once the new operator of Nlex begins imposing higher toll fees.

Toll along the Nlex are to increase by 388 percent for light vehicles as well as heavy trucks and by 510 percent for light trucks and buses.

Manila North Tollways Corp., a consortium led by Lopez-owned First Philippine Infrastructure Development is taking over the operations of the Nlex after investing $371 million to rehabilitate and modernize the 84-kilometer expressway running from Balintawak to Sta. Ines in Pampanga.

MNTC president Jose "Ping" De Jesus who was secretary of Public Works and Highways during the time of President Aquino says that benefits of the new Nlex far outweigh what appears to be a substantial increase in fees.

The consortium that includes state-owned Philippine National Construction Corp., French firm Egis and Australia's Leighton Asia Ltd. has resurfaced or smoothened the road on the entire stretch, added two more lanes on both sides for most part, built four new interchanges, expanded four toll gates, and installed a new monitoring system that includes emergency phone boxes along the highway, improved roadway lighting and digital signs warning of traffic ahead.

Ensuring safety

The phone boxes directly connect with the tollway operator and can't be used to call home, according to De Jesus. But at least, one won't get stranded and helpless along the Nlex anymore and the 24-hour emergency assistance is sure to respond immediately, he says.

De Jesus claims even towing fees are to drop by half once the consortium takes over. The base fee of P1,500 for towing should go down by 50 percent.

The PNCC says about 150,000 motorists pass through the North Expressway daily. This number should increase to 180,000 after MNTC takes over.

The MNTC chief says a study conducted by UP Planades, which the group had commissioned, shows that taking the new Nlex is cheaper even with the higher toll fees compared to when the PNCC was charging lower but the road condition was poor.

Vehicle operating costs

He says there is such a thing as vehicle operating costs or Voc which factors in gas consumption and vehicle wear and tear, especially of parts like tires and batteries.

De Jesus believes Voc should be computed with the toll fee to give a complete picture of the costs and benefits of traveling along the expressway.

Cars, for instance, are to pay P2.49 per kilometer along the closed system area—the portion from Marilao to Pampanga that charges on a per kilometer basis. The open system portion from Balintawak to Marilao shall impose a flat fee of P14 for cars, P35 for buses and P42 for trucks.

Right now, cars pay a toll of 26 centavos per kilometer along the Nlex but Voc costs is estimated by UP Planades at P7.71 per km or a total of P7.97 per km.

De Jesus says Voc is to drop to P4.94 each kilometer once the consortium takes over so the total costs for cars is only about P7.41 per km. This means savings of 56 centavos per kilometer for those to use the new Nlex.

Higher savings

Based on the UP Planades study, buses and trucks are to realize even higher savings of P3.50 per km and P5.75 per km, even as toll rates are to increase to 6.23 for buses from 52 centavos and to 7.47 for trucks from 78 centavos.

Voc for buses during the old Nlex is placed at P21.49 per km, against P12.28 in the new expressway while trucks' VOC of P26.70 is to go down to P14.26 with the new Nlex, according to MNTC.

"If we include travel time, the savings are even much higher at P1.19 per km for cars and P8.04 per km for buses. Apparently, it is same for trucks at P5.75 per km," he says.

De Jesus says the new rates are to be submitted for the Toll Regulatory Board approval by November. The TRB would review whether MNTC's computation in coming up with the toll fees are in line with the formula set in the Supplemental Toll Operations Agreement signed by the consortium with the government in 1998.

BOT project

The Nlex rehab is a build-operate-and-transfer project. By 2030, the consortium would turn over the Nlex back to the government.

Once the TRB approves the new toll rates, cars and jeeps or class 1 would have to pay P200 for the entire stretch, light trucks or class 2 would shell out P500 and trucks or class 3 would be charged P600.

After a toll fee hike in July, PNCC now charges P41 for cars and jeeps, P82 for light trucks and P123 for heavy trucks that would pass along the Nlex.

De Jesus stresses that on the average, class 1 vehicles or cars and FX's travel only an average of 31 kilometers.

"This means that the average motorists would pay only P75 when they use the Nlex. Only 7 out of 100 motorists travel the full length," he notes.

MNTC's toll structure is comprised of a flat P42 for cars traveling from Balintawak to Marilao and P2.49 per kilometer from Marilao to Sta. Ines.

The fee scheme is comprised

of a base rate of P14 and P82 centavos per km set in 1998 which were adjusted later depending on inflation and foreign exchange.

Based on the Stoa, MNTC is also allowed to increase the fees by 1 percent each year even if inflation and the exchange rate were constant. The toll fee scheme was computed using a 14 percent return-on-investment for the private group, says De Jesus.

De Jesus claims the only concession MNTC sought from the government was an assurance that the state would abide with the rate formula specified in the Stoa.

If the government would decide to subsidize the Nlex rates, then it would have to reimburse MNTC the difference multiplied to the actual expressway users, the MNTC chief explains.

"Before we reach financial closure, creditors require the signing of the Stoa and the turnover of right-of-way. These documents serve as guarantee that the project is viable and therefore, they will be paid," says De Jesus.

Creditors financed $253 million of the $371 million project.

The P42 flat rate for the first 14 kilometers starting from Balintawak classified as open is cheaper compared to the P95 that the Skyway charges for the 9-km stretch of open highway from Magallanes to Bicutan.

gious prize that an industry player can receive.

PNOC edged out Solarmundo's Linear Fresnel Solar Power Plant from Belgium and Elsam's Harns Rev Offshore Wind Farm from Denmark.

The two projects bagged second and third places, respectively.

Of more than 1,000 nominated energy projects worldwide, some of which came from Asian countries, the Philippines and India were the only in the region that had entries that reached the finals.

PNOC bagged the award by registering the highest score after being evaluated using the following criteria: sustainability and efficiency, innovative approach, cost/benefit, and replication potential.

The state firm received 10,000 Euros (about P714,000) and a 10-kilogram bronze statue for bagging the award.

A television crew from Austria's National TV (as the award was presented in Linz, Austria) also came to the Philippines to document how the project worked and how it affected the lives of people in areas covered by the program.

Electricity in far-flung areas, better lives for more Filipinos and a prestigious award that proves just how world-class the Filipino is.

Power Plant Mall's Scare Fair

It's that time of the year when knee-high goblins and ghouls yell, "Trick or Treat!!" and get their Jack-O-Lantern goody bags filled to the brim with candy.

This Halloween, Rockwell's Power Plant Mall will be giving shoppers a whole lot of tricks and a truckload of treats.

Children ages twelve years old and below who were able to pre-register for Power Plant Mall's Halloween treat can watch the screenings of "Scooby Doo 2" (the movie) at Cinemas 5 and 6 at 10am and 10:30am.

And since Halloween would never be complete without bags full of candy, pre-registered kids can go all around the mall to selected shops for a Trick-or-Treat spree!

Minute monsters and wee witches are encouraged to come in costume for a Kiddie Parade around the Mall that starts at 2pm. Judges will be on the lookout during the parade for the terror tot with the most creative and original costume and will be given a grand prize.

Kids who were unable to register need not fret because loads of entertainment is in store for them too. Starting at 3pm, Jugglers and acrobats will perform at the North Court of the Mall. While the South Court of the Mall will be transformed into a circus of activities from 11AM onwards. Face painters, glitter and henna tattoo artists, balloon twisters, cotton candy food carts and a whole lot more are in store for kids of all ages. Power Plant Mall's Halloween fair is guaranteed to raise your child's hair, not in fright but in sheer delight!

Chocolates will be given away courtesy of Cadbury.

THE PRINCESS is moved to tears by a presentation of young, unwed mothers at the Makati Coliseum.

MORE of the neglected get special royal attention.

THE 47-YEAR-OLD royal mom shares her table with wards of Jade, Virlanie's home for special children (above). At right, she makes a stop along a dark, narrow alley in a depressed area in Makati. At times, the princess has to bend to avoid the drying laundry and whatnot suspended along her path.

Princess of Hearts

Text and photos by Cheche V. Moral

PRINCESS ba siya talaga? Ang simple lang niya. (Is she really a princess? She's so simple.)

Sans makeup and dressed simply in a navy pant suit, white T-shirt and brown alligator loafers, Princess Caroline of Hanover made a hush-hush visit to a youth detention center in Manila early Monday morning. Not quite the elaborately dressed, tiara-ed, fairy tale princess envisioned by the center's wards but so what.

"Mukha siyang mabait (She seems nice)," said Jeffrey, 17, a vagrant youth in the custody of the Department of Social Welfare's Reception and Action Center (RAC) in Anteroos.

RAC was the first stop of the Monaco royal's three-day Manila visit to raise funds for Virlanie Foundation, a beneficiary of Amade Mondiale, a humanitarian organization founded by the princess' late mother, Princess Caroline took over the reins of Amade Mondiale 10 years ago.

It was the princess' first visit to the country. Arriving promptly at 8 a.m., the princess went directly to the decrepit RAC building, and into the tiny room for infants on the second level. She sat on a young boy on her left lap and quietly chatted with the young mothers who were in RAC's custody.

Focus on street kids

Virlanie's primary mission is to look after the welfare of street children. Founded in 1992 by Dominique Lemay, a Frenchman married to a Filipina, the non-government organization has also included vagrant families, abused women and children in conflict with the law among its causes. Virlanie is a benefactor of RAC, and the youth detention center right across it, the Manila Youth Reception Center (MYRC).

Lemay, with lawyer Eric Mallonga, president of Amade Philippines and Virlanie's legal counsel, had met with the princess on several trips to Monaco for Amade Mondiale's events. It was on those visits that Princess Caroline learned of Lemay's work, and expressed her desire to help him in his efforts.

The princess' arrival, Lemay said, "will bring focus on the plight of children in the Philippines, and enjoin Filipinos to the cause."

Virlanie has 300 children directly under its care, all housed in 12 homes. Up to 500 more who live in the areas of Payatas in Quezon City; Tondo, Manila; and Brgy. Singkamas, Makati, are getting support from the NGO, making it the "biggest foundation in the Philippines."

"But very few people know of us," Lemay bemoaned. "No one would listen to me. [I told the princess], Madame, maybe the people will listen to you."

Princess Caroline, eldest child of Prince Rainier of Monaco and the former Hollywood icon Grace Kelly, arrived in the country alone, contrary to earlier reports that said she would be accompanied by her husband, Prince Ernst August of Hanover. Except for the black-tie fundraiser, she refused any hoopla for her RP visit, her schedule kept under tight wraps.

Exclusive access

Closely guarded by burly bodyguards, the press was barred from talking or going near the princess. Photographers weren't also allowed into the RAC/MYRC premises (and for all her other activities, for that matter), prompting some foreign photographers to prop themselves up against the iron fence outside, paparazzi style.

Manila Mayor Lito Atienza, who assisted the princess in inaugurating the Virlanie-funded new building for adult vagrants, even had a minor spat with the princess' official photographer when the latter prevented the mayor's photographer from taking photos.

PRINCESS Caroline of Hanover, for all her simplicity, has a commanding presence, a quiet authority that's proving beneficial in bringing attention to her causes.

Before leaving for the airport Wednesday night, however, the INQUIRER was briefly allowed exclusive access to the princess. A mother of four children herself, she told this writer how the Manila visit had affected her personally.

"It was very moving to be with the children," the princess said. "I saw all kinds of children, many children with very special needs, children in jail, children who are given another chance."

Crimes against children

On Monday, the royal lingered in the cramped MYRC detention center, right across RAC, where 186 youths were detained. The center has an ideal capacity of 100.

"She was very emotional," Lemay said of the princess. "She was very touched" at the children's presentation, including a Tinikling dance, "but she felt the situation was so terrible. She said it was not normal to put 40 children together in a 30 sq-m room. She couldn't understand how all these people could fit in such a small space."

The young detainees are roomed together based on their physical sizes, said Rosalina de Leon, the social worker who heads MYRC. This is to avoid the smaller children from being bullied by the bigger boys. In the past, riots and a jailbreak had taken place in the center.

"The princess was concerned about the small dining area," De Leon said. "I explained to her that we feed them in [batches]."

She told the INQUIRER she hopes to see an "improvement in the conditions of the center of detention for children" the next time she visits.

Despite its already dismal state, De Leon said MYRC's budget was further slashed following the notice of a fiscal crisis. "Our budget is still for 100 children. It's good that vegetables confiscated [from illegal vendors] are brought here to feed our wards."

Lemay said Virlanie has been working to rehabilitate the two particular shelters in Manila. The last time something was done for the facilities was in 1992. He had the new building finished in two months in time for the princess' arrival. "Now it's clean [because the princess is coming]. But

The Princess of Monaco spent almost her entire first visit to the Philippines with needy children

[on other days] it's really, really bad."

Most of MYRC's wards are awaiting trial for crimes like theft ("mostly cell phone"), rape, robbery and other misdemeanors. Others are "rescued" from the city jails in Manila and Malabon, as they were being lumped with hardened criminals, added Malonga.

Malonga heads the local chapter of Amade, or World Association of Children's Friends. The Philippines is the first member-state of Amade in Asia. Founded by Princess Grace in 1963, initially in support of anti-abortion, abused children and orphanages, Amade now supports humanitarian efforts to aid children, in protection of their ethical and legal rights.

"We have proposed to the United Nations to make crimes against children as crimes against humanity," Malonga said. "This will protect children from child pornography especially in the Internet, sex trafficking."

On Monday afternoon, Princess Caroline was moved to tears when a group of young unwed mothers and pregnant girls rendered the song "Greatest Love of All," in a late lunch with Virlanie's wards and event donors and organizers at the Makati Coliseum. Some of the young women had infants cradled in their arms.

Courtesy call

But that was perhaps the only poignant moment in the afternoon for the princess who had just come from a courtesy call with the President, who reportedly promised the princess to speed up the adoption process to six months or a year. Lemay said it normally took two years to legally adopt a child.

Smartly dressed in a navy skirt, silk polka dot shirt and black low-heeled pumps, Princess Caroline visibly enjoyed the children's song-and-dance presentations. She playfully cradled kids on her lap, including a young girl Lemay is in the process of adopting.

The princess partook of the simple meal, consisting of pancit, rice, chicken and fish dishes. Typical of Filipinos, VIPs later took turns with Virlanie wards to have their photos taken with the princess.

On Monday night, a dinner-fundraiser was held at the Makati Shangri-La in honor of the princess, which was expected to raise P10 million for Virlanie's projects. Highlighted by an Inno Sotto fashion show, some 400 of Manila's philanthropists attended the event.

On Wednesday, a forum was held at the Makati Shangri-La to discuss Amade's UN proposal. "There is only one constant, the world's recognition that children are treasures," the princess said in her speech.

She also visited the children who had gotten ill from the toxic wastes left by the former US Bases in Subic and Clark. The royal had personally asked US President George W. Bush "to provide humanitarian aid and compensation to the victims and their families." She was, however, told that the Philippine government had agreed to free America of any legal obligations after the departure of the American military forces.

One of the two rape victims in MYRC custody begged the princess to help her see her baby on Christmas. The princess, in turn, asked Atienza to make sure the girl gets her wish, and that the girls be taken care of. She also made him promise to help reunite some of the children with their families. "I told him I'll follow up on his promise to the princess," Lemay said.

Before leaving Wednesday night, the princess spent the morning visiting several of Virlanie's homes in a depressed area in Makati. A young orphan dressed in a hula costume shyly sat on her lap. The royal gently rocked her to the hula tune playing in the background. The girl wrapped her arms around the princess' neck, reluctant to let go.

Quiet grace

Princess Caroline had a quiet grace, but an intense presence that commanded respect. Everywhere she went, kibitzers were held agog. Even at the dinner fundraiser Monday night, her simplicity was a stark contrast to the bejeweled local guests. At the dinner, the princess reportedly told a curious society matron she didn't bring jewelry on her travels.

She reportedly did ask to see pieces from a local jeweler known for South Sea pearls. Pressed for time—with no assistants in tow, she packed her own bags—the princess instead asked for the jeweler's catalog to peruse on her way home.

Lemay said the princess promised to try her best to help him in his fight for the rights of children in the Philippines. She was also made aware that Virlanie is working largely without help from the government, even as Lemay couldn't help but feel that certain politicians were around "only to have their photos taken with the princess."

BLACK marble-limestone cliff, wild vegetation and white-sand beach

The town has the northern Palawan

ecodestination

SECURITY was tight that day on board MV Our Lady of Medyugorje bound for Coron and Puerto Princesa, capital city of Palawan. The military, still mindful of the tragedy that had befallen SuperFerry 14, were visible; and their well-trained, disciplined dogs went around nonchalantly sniffing the bags of the passengers.

It was a 28-hour voyage from Manila. We arrived early the following morning at Coron Port. Ah, there was the cruise ship MV Coco Explorer, by now something of an old friend, on its way to nearby Coron Island, a major ecotourist destination, with its load of Danish tourists.

That evening the stars were out in full force, despite some rainshowers earlier and cloudy skies. A quarter moon shone over Puerto Princesa as the ship approached, gliding over the bay, and the lights of the city began to materialize in the distance.

Fabled town

Upon arrival I was welcomed by my hosts Nonoy and Ruby Lanzas. Nonoy is a songwriter-musician and his family band, Simka, serves as a cultural ambassador of Mayor Edward Hagedorn. The Lanzas children often perform with the group. There are the two girls Ela (now based in Amanpulo) and Kun, and the two boys Jerico and Christian Piccolo.

For this latest trip to Palawan, my ecodestination was the elusive, fabled town of El Nido, which has been beckoning to me through the years, although no invitation was forthcoming from the upscale island resorts. From Puerto Princesa to El Nido, which lies 270 km north of the capital, is a long way by bus (daily 9 a.m., P350 per, Sweety Transport or Eulen Joy—such names!)

The trip may take all of eight hours. In our case, it was even longer because of faulty brakes. The driver had to stop three times so that the technician—backed up by a staff complement of about six, with two toolboxes on the ready—could trouble-shoot the technical problem.

And so "Sweety" plunged northward, passing through a long, well-paved highway and then an endless dirt road, through mountain zigzags, forested areas, Protected Areas ("Malampaya Sound"), areas under construction, landslide areas, mangrove areas, glimpses of the sea, dusty trails, detours, military checkpoints ("AFP Assistance Centers"), small bridges (ST 20T capacity), fields of green and paths of red (clay).

The last leg of the journey was Taytay, with its historic Port Barton, Santa Monica parish church and panorama of Taytay Bay, with adoring islands in the background. One of them must surely be Apulit, home of Club Noah Isabelle.

Past Taytay came a first-ever glimpse of Bacuit Bay, off El Nido, with several islands near the coast filled with mangroves. Lake Coron Bay, with its hidden lakes, and Taytay Bay, with its fauna-friendly islands, Bacuit Bay, with its hidden lagoons, is one of the glories of Northern Palawan.

It was night when we finally arrived at El Nido, which blunted the town's impact upon me. But even in the darkness, my myopic eyes could already discern the towering cliffs of marble and limestone, which ring part of the town, and imbue El Nido with its distinct character. Without these marvels of the sea, El Nido would be just another coastal town.

Black marble wall

The influx of tourists has raised the prices of foodstuff in El Nido, and local residents complain about this. One kilo of chicken costs more than in Manila, and a platito (small dish) of chicken afritada goes for P40 in an eatery. The town has many budget inns and lodging houses, but the prices may be tourist-oriented.

As for me, thanks to good friend Navy Capt. Mike Rodriguez, I was lucky enough to be accommodated at the Javlon House, a ministry of engineer Ernesto Fernandez and his sister Teresita R. Laumond (married to a Frenchman). The Fernandez family has converted their heart-shaped Matinloc Island into a Marian shrine ("Look for the heart of my Son in Matinloc") and a retreat-house with modern facilities.

Homey and comfortable, with a garden

SENTINEL of the sea

trellis, Javlon House stands right beside a sheer wall of black marble with white-washed streaks, and trees and vegetation up high.

Caretakers Minda, Abe and Totoy were very attentive. With some amusement, Abe recalled that some guests were afraid that portions of the marble wall would fall upon the house. But the mission house has been there for years—and the cliff has been there for centuries—and nothing has happened.

You wake up early and the first thing you see outside your window is the wall. You can reach out to touch it—well, almost.

Just walk around town for a few minutes and you will soon come upon the beach front and get a preview of what Bacuit Bay has in store for you. There's a big, wide beach cove and coastal cliffs and mountains, pump boats, trees, houses and nearby islands.

Nearing completion by the pier is the garishly pink building of the Philippine Ports Authority. Television and radio programs from Metro Manila are heard in El Nido, but there are no newspapers. Electricity is on only from 1 p.m.-1 a.m.

For this budget tourist, another bonus from Javlon Int'l. (Phils.) came in the form of a cruise around the bay, and lunch at Matinloc Island. Nearby is Tapiutan Island, also owned by the Fernandezes, with cottages that used to serve as military barracks. At least one navy patrol boat always hovers around the area to protect the resorts.

Hidden lagoon

We passed by Miniloc Island, and young Japanese tourists who were kayaking and snorkeling, waved at us. Some were proceeding to the famous hidden lagoon, accessible only by canoe through a hole in the wall.

Excitedly the boatman pointed to a pavilion swimming in the moderately rough coastal waters. (It is windy in Palawan from October to February.)

Like the Calamian Group of Islands farther north and the Isles of Taytay Bay, the islands of Bacuit Bay have different shapes and contours, ranging from massive and fortress-like to graceful and undulating. One vaguely resembles a chopper at rest, and is thus called Helicopter Island.

Ah, face to face at last with El Nido's seascape, marine life, black marble and limestone cliffs garlanded by yucca flowers and tolsty trees, and jagged rock formations. They don't seem that impressive from a distance, especially if you have seen comparable ecodestinations in Palawan. But as the pump boat approaches, you feel awed by the natural grandeur. These cliffs are said to be millions of years old.

This is part of the El Nido-Taytay Managed Protected Area, one of seven such sanctuaries in Palawan. The others are: Caait Game Preserve & Wildlife Sanctuary, Coron Island Protected Area, Maampaya Sound Land and Seascape Protected Area, Puerto Princesa Subterranean River National Park, Tubbataha Reef National Marine Park, and Ursula Island Game Refuge and Bird Sanctuary.

Forest 'returns' to La Mesa

BANTAY Kalikasan (Filipino for Environment Watch) is one of ABS-CBN Foundation's frontline projects currently being undertaken to maintain the La Mesa Watershed, once known simply as La Mesa Dam.

The watershed is adjacent to the Sierra Madre mountain range that lies astride Caloocan, R. zal and Quezon City. Its proximity to urban Metro Manila doubles its importance, because it supplies water to millions of people in the area.

Gina Lopez, the foundation's managing director, sees the need to maintain La Mesa not only because it is a filtration and water reservoir (though this would be reason enough), but also because it is beautifully green. It is one of, if not the only, watersheds left in the area, she says.

A forest grows there that must be conserved. It is habitat to several kinds of wildlife and, to many Manilans, especially the younger generation, it is the most accessible place to experience a forest.

When Bantay Kalikasan came into the scene in 1998, almost half of the watershed's 2,700 hectares had been denuded or in a state of degradation. Its workers, many of them volunteers, had to contend with poachers and illegal loggers, who would resort to killing and burning to attain their ends. But Bantay Kalikasan was determined to do its job.

Using its media resources, as well as government and private support, it campaigns for more public awareness of its environmental cause. It has planned it so that La Mesa can truly become an environmental preserve not only to serve entire communities but to provide individuals with an amusement place. The trees planted there, for the most part, endemic—banaba, kamagong, dao, guijo, ipil, mahogany, molave, narra, lauan, and others—are now occupying 1,200 hectares since, and they are surviving well.

The first trees were officially planted in 1999, though planting started the year before. What Gina Lopez wishes to inculcate in the public is a simple equation: the more trees, the more water produced.

To secure the safety of the watershed, 10 watch towers (of various materials) have been constructed. These serve as lookouts in case of fire or other untoward incidents. In tree-planting, spacing is considered of primary importance, as well as drawing up of firelines so that fire, should one crop up, does not spread readily.

Eco-Park

To complement the forested areas, says Marlo Mendoza, Bantay Kalikasan executive director, an Eco-Park is being created on 30 hectares. The idea is to make it a fun destination for families, especially children. Already, 38 km of forest trails and roads have been laid out for hiking, horse riding, biking and all out nature tripping. Improvements have also been done on the lake site for swimming, boating, and even fishing.

An Ecology Center will rise in the park for lectures and briefings, as well as a Museum of Natural History designed to continue developing through the years. Proceeds from these features will go into further improvement of the Eco-Park.

Concert party

Bantay Kalikasan does not wish to tarry too long on this VIP (very important project) and, in fact, would like to see it completed by 2005. It has organized a fund-raising event geared to prick the interest of young and old.

"Motown in Motion" is a big dance concert party with a '60s theme. The '60s era was chosen because it was an age when strong statements on art, music and culture, in general were made, some of which still linger today.

Bantay Kalikasan feels that duplicating these strong points will help its present environmental mission. The concert party will be held Nov. 17 at the NBC Tent at The Fort. While it will recall the sounds of such Motown stars as Michael Jackson, Smokey Robinson, Stevie Wonder and other American icons, it will also feature Filipino talents like Rico J. Puno, Hajji Alejandro, Jacqui Magno, Vemi Varga, Richard Merck, and hot young stars Nina, Kyla, Paolo Santos, Jimmy Bondoc, Bituin Escalante, Akafellas and many others.

Party cohosts will be Ariel Ureta and Mitch Valdez.

BEFORE SHE and her husband moved to their condominium unit at one of Essensa's imposing residential towers a few years ago, the wife had already set her heart on a contemporary home with Japanese and Chinese touches.

Instead of hiring the services of an interior designer, as is de rigueur among residents of the upscale address, she was determined to do the place herself. After paying a fortune for the unit, the couple (names withheld upon request) couldn't spare a few pesos more.

Of course, they're just being modest. But despite all the headaches she went through, the wife, who cooks as well as she designs, doesn't regret her decision to roll up her sleeves and put on an interior designer's hat.

"My taste is really eclectic," she says. "I'm partial to the Japanese look, which is a bit askew. Overall, however, it [the look] always manages to have harmony."

In between managing the family's export business, the couple, especially the wife, scoured Metro Manila in search of ideal furniture and accent pieces. She also had to deal with several finishers and furniture makers, some of whom took almost "forever" to deliver the goods.

"It's a good thing the building's construction had been delayed," the wife says with a chuckle. "Otherwise, we would have moved into a half-empty house."

Unobtrusive yet elegant

The long wait seems to have been worth it. Unobtrusive yet elegant furniture pieces fashioned room. For want of a specific line or inspiration, the custom-built pieces can be described as Japanese meets Scandinavian. They're so cleanly made and sturdy that they act as ideal counterpoints to the textured Chinese antiques the wife has bought from such pricey haunts as Arts of Asia, Old Asia and Pointe East. She promptly converted them either as armchairs or accent pieces to hide all the "clutter."

As they had to leave almost all their old furniture pieces behind, the wife also commissioned Antipolo-based designer Benjie Reyes to design and execute a number of accent pieces. Two such pieces are high-back wooden chairs featured in a corner of the living room.

"Even my clothes were left in the old house," says the wife. "That's another thing we learned about condo living. Due to limited space, you can't afford to hang on to things you have no use for."

Since the wife's closet, for instance, has just enough space for her clothes, she now has to part with one item to make room for another. One of the few things the couple brought with them when they made the big move was a nondescript narra bookcase that now sits along the corridor leading to the bedrooms. It has been a silent witness to the family's changing fortunes.

"We were still living in an apartment in Cubao when we bought that bookcase," says the wife. "For some reason, it always manages to fit in wherever we go."

Best option

The couple, whose former address was in San Juan, found the old house too big for them. They promptly turned it into their office. After all, their eldest son is now married and practices medicine in Baguio, while their youngest son is also based most of the time there. Condo living has become the best option for the empty-nesters.

"You can lock up the unit and leave anytime," says the husband, referring to their new home. "Security and maintenance have now become the least of our worries."

Still, it was no walk in the park to come up with the interesting but clutter-free interiors. It was a deliberate effort since the couple works most of the time in their factory, where they take in more than their fair share of stimuli.

The living room, for instance, is anchored on several key pieces: A set of light gray leather sofa and armchairs from Italy, a medium-size stone-topped black coffee table and an extra-long wooden buffer table that's equally expensive and difficult to transport.

If anything, the couple's experience with the table is also a cautionary tale for future condo dwellers. It took sometime before the wife finally bought it, as she found it quite big and expensive. In fact, she dillydallied at first until someone beat her to it.

"I was thankful since I don't have to think about it anymore," she says. "But lo and behold, when I went back to the shop several days later, I saw the same table. It was already being sold at a discount."

The fellow who bought the table, whom the wife assumed was also from Essenza, was said to have returned it since it wouldn't fit in the elevator. She should have listened to her instincts and simply let go of it, but the markdown was too good to refuse. Besides she was couch should be, imparts the living room with a retro-modern look. For a dash of color, she added two ox-blood red leather chairs, also from Italy, into the mix.

Since she and her husband lived several floors up, she used the model unit downstairs as a gauge every time she intended to buy furniture. For some reason, everything fell into place, including the color scheme, which the wife later learned matched the colors found on a Chinese-made divider she bought at Jo-Lisa's.

Light gray, ox-blood red, brown, black, off-white and touches of gold and silver are also the very same colors that make up the figures drawn on several of the divider's panels, two of which now function as double doors leading to the powder room.

"Isn't it amazing?" the wife gushes. "Nothing on the divider was retouched. The same thing happened in our bedroom, where the chaise lounge made of grayish blue leather matched the color of the curtains. It wasn't intentional."

To add an illusion of space to the living room and dining area, the wife had a series of mirrors with beveled edges installed by the dining table, a square 12-seater made from a series of square slabs of black kamagong.

The wife had some of the artworks framed, including lithographs by Japanese artist Toko Shinoda, an antique Chinese scroll and, believe it or not, a sheet of lowly Japanese gift wrapping paper the couple bought in San Francisco. They're also proud owners of a BenCab and an Amylou Junio.

"Don't be too dependent on your interior designer," says the wife. "As long as you know what you want and have the means to get them, don't be afraid to experiment. It's your home, anyway."

One more thing: Be sure that everything you buy fits in the elevator.

really in love with the table, which the hubby eventually paid for in lieu of a new set of golf clubs he intended to give her for Christmas.

When delivery time came, the wife was "conveniently" out shopping. The task of receiving and supervising the deliverymen to haul the huge piece several floors up fell on the poor husband. And, boy, did they have to wrack their brains to figure out a way to do it since the table—you guessed it—wouldn't fit in the elevator or the stairs.

Luckily, a maintenance team was inspecting the elevator that day. They suggested that they transport the table on top instead of inside the elevator. That they eventually did, with two men holding the table as it stood on its side as the lift climbed slowly on "inspection" mode.

"I was so afraid my husband would kill me," says the amused wife, "that I asked my friend to accompany me home that day."

LILLES-AKIYAMA NUPTIALS

A wedding of international proportions

WHEN Patricia Lilles and Tomoyoshi Akiyama exchanged vows in Vancouver, Canada, 150 people from eight different countries were there to witness the event.

Lilles, an interior designer, is from a family of builders. She is the daughter of the late Remigio M. Lilles and the former Angelita Dizon. Akiyama, a computer graphics animator for Electronic Arts, is the son of renowned symphony orchestra conductor Kazuyoshi Akiyama and his wife Keiko.

The couple met in 2001. A year later, the friendship had developed into a romantic relationship.

Fixing a date for the wedding so family and relatives living outside Vancouver can attend was not easy. The maestro, the groom's father, has his schedule fixed two years in advance. He only had three days in July free.

The wedding was held at St. Anthony's, a claspboard Catholic church atop a sloping garden in West Vancouver. Reception followed at the Capilano Golf and Country Club at the British Properties.

The bride's mother, Lita, joined her daughter in Vancouver, attending to her needs and establishing and supervising a global wedding communication network. Older sister Cindy Lilles Maceda, who is based in London, coordinated with bridesmaids Karen Kunawicz and Isabelle Ramos in Manila, and Lee Gibson in Hong Kong for the bridal shower. Her brothers Robert and Tony, along with their wives, handled wedding logistics from Manila.

The groom's mother, Keiko, and older brother Mashi coordinated with sister Makiko Akiyama Scully who lives in Palm Desert with her husband, Robert Scully, manager of an exclusive golf club. She "organized" the rest of the family in Tokyo. Best man Philippe des Arts worked via remote control from Zurich with groomsmen Brock Jackson and Steven Quinn in Vancouver.

Lilles' strapless bridal gown was made of white organza over satin and beaded sparingly. It was elegant though simple. The bridesmaids' gowns were designed and executed by Manila's Buda Gomez. The silver-gray satin strapless gowns had a silk organza jacquard and stylized obi in acknowledgment of the groom's Japanese heritage. The bridesmaids had matching kimono-inspired opera coats.

Camille Samson of Fresh soaps in Manila provided the wedding favors—bars of sampaguita soap in beaded pouches of the same material as the bridesmaids' obi.

Members of both families joined the bridal march. They were led by the groom's father, who arrived from Tokyo earlier that same day. Miela Lilles, the bride's 9-year-old niece, was a picture of grace and decorum throughout the ceremony.

The bride, dazzling in her finery, entered on the arm of her oldest brother, Robert, as her groom, dashing in a tuxedo, waited at the altar.

A string quartet from the Vancouver Symphony played Beethoven's "Ode to Joy" at the end of the ceremony.

The Capilano Golf and Country Club lent an Old-World dignity to the reception. Dining tables were named after cities where guests came from. The dinner buffet was a collaboration of different chefs and the couple's mothers. The centerpiece was a wedding cake by well-known pastry chef Thomas Haas.

Among those who offered toasts to the newlyweds was the groom's brother Mashi, who was overcome with emotion as he attempted to deliver his speech. He was graciously rescued by his brother who gave him a tight hug.

Maid of honor and the bride's best friend, Karen, paid tribute to their 30-year friendship and to the bride's family, of which she has been a part.

St. Therese of the Child Jesus inspires new Carmelite nun

SISTER Marissa Therese of the Eucharist, OCD

IN ONE of my columns in 1988, I wrote about St. Therese of the Child Jesus which Marissa Villalobos, a 27-year-old certified public accountant, read. She had not heard of the saint before and didn't know there was a Carmelite monastery in Laoag City, although she was a native of Solsona, Ilocos Norte.

The seed of vocation was planted after she read my column, she told me after her profession of perpetual vows last Oct. 15 at the Carmelite Chapel.

Marissa searched for a convent where she could be a Carmelite postulant, then found her "home" in the monastery in Laoag. She entered in 1995 at the age of 34 and was a postulant for nine months, a novice for two years. She made her temporary vows in

PURELY PERSONAL

Josephine Darang

1998. When the choir sang the Litany of Saints, she prostrated herself in total surrender to Her Maker and committed to a life of sacrifice and prayer as a Carmelite nun.

Sister Marissa is the second Ilocana to enter the Carmelite Monastery in Laoag (the first was Sister Pauline Datoc in 1958) and its 11th cloistered nun. There are four extern nuns for a total of 15.

Sister Antonia said the community welcomed late vocations. Interested young women can text Sister Phoebe at 0916-7481756 or Sister Luz at 0916-2509810, call (077) 7221331 or write the prioress, Mother

On Oct. 15, feast of Sta. Teresa de Avila, she took the name Sister Marissa Therese of the Eucharist as she professed her perpetual vows, kneeling behind the grills of the WOMEN of Carmel: (front row) Gloria Pastor, Myrna Campos and Paz de la Cuesta; Mildred Ranada, Ely Santos, Sister Phoebe, Evelyn Ruiz and Evelyn Gee

Mary Joseph, Carmelite Monastery, P Gomez Street, Laoag City.

Women of Carmel

I went home to Laoag for Sister Marissa's solemn profession and found out that my childhood friends had become "Women of Carmel." They hear Mass at the monastery at 6:30 every morning and join its various projects. I speak fondly of Mildred Bustamante-Ranada, Myrna de la Cuesta-Campos, Elizabeth Lazo-Santos, Evelyn Dayoan-Gee and Evelyn Raval-Ruiz.

The other members are Tessie Tiong Ablan, Gloria Pastor, Paz de la Cuesta, Gloria Caluya and Gloria Reyes.

Having been together from kindergarten to high school at the Holy Spirit Academy, I was happy that they heard Mass every day. The grace has helped them cope with motherhood and the business of running their own enterprises. Mildred runs Ranada General Hospital with her husband, Dr. Francisco Ranada Jr., and Evelyn Gee has concocted a special pancit canton with husband Robert in their famous La Moda restaurant along Rizal Street. Ely Lazo Santos runs a beauty parlor in Fairview, Quezon City, but goes home to Laoag to oversee the Lazo Fashion School.

It was what Fr. Paulo Gamboa, OCD, would call "experiencing God's love." Sister Marissa also felt the same when she entered the monastery at age 34.

Family moments

I had to go home to Laoag after four years to experience what my friend Maripaz Godinez called "a special irreplaceable wonder that immediate family gives." I had dinner with my Grade 5 teacher Manuela Savelano and my mother Lourdes Darang in my brother Abe's restaurant. We talked about how God had been very good to our families.

At Texicano Hotel where I stayed, my brother Joe brought coffee from his house nearby and talked to me about his job as Social Studies teacher at the Ilocos Norte High School. I was surprised to find out he could recite "Mi Ultimo Adios" in Spanish.

Going to Mass again at St. William's Cathedral (this time at the Janssen Hall) brought memories of our school days at Divine Word College where Evelyn Raval-Ruiz and I were classmates. It reminded me of our English Literature teacher Elvira Albano, who died in 1997, of cancer. It was because of her I made English my major.

My aunt, Jean Darang-Rillera, a retired court stenographer, updated me on the family. On Oct. 17 before I returned to Manila, my brother Abe and his wife Rose took us (my classmates and I) to their farm in Balacud, where we had Ilocano dishes for lunch.

We bonded with their children, Christina, Jessica, Julie Ann and Elaine. It made me grateful for our blessings.

During my short stay, my classmates and I had lunch with Tessie Tiong Ablan and her husband Nonong at their Palazzio de Laoag Hotel. It was a happy time.

Congregation is 25

The Congregation del Santissimo Nombre del Niño Jesus celebrated its 25th anniversary last Oct. 24. Fr. Manuel Bongayan, SVD, said Mass at the Sto. Niño Chapel on Rodriguez Avenue, QC. Leading the celebration was founding chair Ben Parrales.

For the past 25 years, the congregation has been holding the Sto. Niño fiesta exhibit and the grand procession on Roxas Boulevard from the Philtrade to the Luneta on the last Sunday of January.

Seminarian needs help

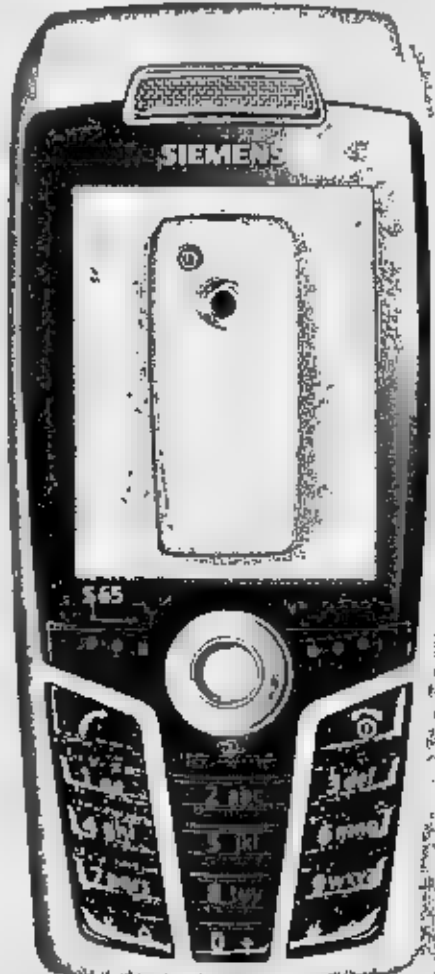

Fr. Richie Santos, a Salesian priest of Don Bosco, is asking for help for seminarian Edmon Medes, a third-year philosophy student at the Franciscans of St. Anthony Seminary. Bro. Edmon has not paid his board and lodging for five months amounting to P7,500. For the new semester, he has to pay P10,125 to Claret Formation House where he studies. Every month during the six-month 2004-2005 semester, he needs P1,800 for transportation and P1,500 for board and lodging. The six-month total is P19,800. If a benefactor is willing to donate the whole amount of P27,300, praised be Jesus Christ.

Text Father Richie at 0917-6677043 if you want to help. Bro. Edmon is a "late vocation," together with four others who were in Father Richie's Beatitudes Ministry in three public high schools in Pasay City in 1991. God bless you for your kindness.

Wearing my SM tiara in the presence of true royalty

IN the sea of invitations that cluttered my dresser, one very rare invite stood out recently because of the guest of honor named on it.

When the initials H.R.H. are written before a name, one's heartbeat quickens at the prospect of meeting true royalty. Only the heirs of European thrones can be given the title "Her Royal Highness" and these fortunate scions are the only people who can legally wear tiaras.

So what does one wear to a private fundraising dinner for H.R.H. Princess Caroline of Hanover? Violating the royalty code of ethics, I did wear a tiara since I was not seated at her table anyway. In fact, my table was so far from the inner sanctum, the intimate circle that cocooned the princess, that I could even have brought my Royal Camp Suki guards as props and I wouldn't have been noticed. The only way I could see her up close was via the giant video screen near our table.

I wouldn't have even dared to wear a crown if the Princess was within meters of my table. Sometime ago in the colorful Marcos era, former First Lady Imelda Marcos wore a tiara to a royal gala dinner, but she was told that in Europe only true royalty wore crowns. So she wore the tiara as a hair accent in the back. I would have done the same, most probably.

Paparazzi frenzy

The invitation indicated, "Doors will be closed at 7:15 p.m." My well-suited husband Dennis and I (with my feathery white jacket from New Yorker) entered at 8:30 p.m., together with Unilever President Howard Belton. With all the photogs taking our pictures, he said he had never had so much paparazzi greeting him.

Indeed the doors were closed on the dot, but luckily we were ushered in and ended up sitting with amiable PR girl Annie Ringor, who became the smoking buddy of the Princess in between her charity visits earlier that day. Nicely enough, no photos were taken of either lady smoking. And it's a good thing Mayor Binay was not around to enforce the no-smoking rule.

Inno Sotto's haute couture line did a second run in the Amade Philippines-Viriane Foundation dinner. Inno added more suits and semi-formal wear. I think Princess Caroline must have been very impressed. I hope Inno would soon be designing for royalty. I am proud to say he made my wedding gown, one that defied all the traditional rules of wedding design.

FORGET the stiff, tailored suit, prudish decorum and de rigueur politesse. Two bubbly brothers/chefs from the country Down Under put the fun back in first-class dining by dressing down, so to speak, the conventional, stuffy fine-dining experience. And what better way to enjoy food, with all the trappings and pampering of a haute cuisine restaurant, than at the privacy and comfort of your home?

It's dining experience at its finest brought right to your doorstep. The five-setting table, the lovely centerpiece, impeccable china, elegant cutlery and glassware, a private maitre d' plus two excellent chefs de cuisine in the kitchen speak of an unforgettable dining adventure—especially when clients can leisurely partake of their food in comfy jeans and tees.

"Fine dining for us is nice food. It's not about being uncomfortable. It's about enjoying your meal," says Carlos Antonio Jacinto Miguel, 27, brother of Jose Antonio, 31, both chefs de cuisine of their new company, est. Fine Dining (tels. 8424673, 0927-9140294, 0916-3671239; e-mail estinedining@zpd.net).

Testing the waters

Born in the Philippines to a Filipino mother and a Portuguese dad, the brothers were still in grade school when the family migrated to the United States before finally settling down in Sydney, Australia. The young brothers may still be unfamiliar with local tastes and flavors, but both have collectively been cooking for over 20 years in some of the best restaurants in Sydney (Banc) and London (Land House).

Although their main goal is to put up their own world-class restaurant someday, the brothers hope to carve a niche—and build solid contacts and clientele—through est. Fine Dining first. "We're here to test the waters, to see how Filipinos respond to our food," says Antonio.

After working for restaurateurs for most part of their careers, at one point putting in as much as 126 working hours in one week without getting so much as a thank-you bonus from the boss, the brothers decided to make their mark in the culinary world by coming back to their birth land.

Indeed, what better place to introduce a new concept and a different style of food service than in the country where, both say, the demand for new textures and flavors is constantly evolving.

"Ten years ago the Filipino palate wasn't as sophisticated as it is now," says Carlo.

The average Filipino, for instance, is more knowledgeable about the nuances of wine appreciation than they were, say, five years ago.

For a minimum of six people and a maximum of 20 guests, the brothers can serve a unique, exclusive gathering that pleases discriminating palates. A host can either throw an intimate party, or guests can each pay their way for a delightful lunch or dinner get-together.

Est. Fine Dining's extensive menu selection offers three- to eight-course meals for a budget starting at P1,700 per head. Anything lower than that, says Carlo, compromises quality. The chefs consult each client in signing the menu, such as whether progressive or traditional dishes are favored, including suggesting the best wines.

There are the British and French food techniques executed to perfection, Carlo says. That means they make all their own pasta, creams, sorbets, desserts, breads, patés, paté—literally every delectable piece of food is set up on the plate—from scratch.

Passion for experimentation

The brothers share a passion for experimenting with a variety of ingredients—local and imported—to create exquisite entrees. That is why their recipes consist only of a few ingredients. The Miguel brothers never refer to cookbooks, relying mostly on how tastes and textures blend well with the rest of the ingredients.

"We feed off each other, and we have the same method of doing things," Antonio says.

For this dinner, the brothers have given duck breast a local twist by curing it for two to three hours with honey sourced from Tagaytay and imported brandy to take away its gamy flavor. The chestnut tartlet is a creamy leek that goes with it is a distinctly traditional European touch. Another fusion is the Pineapple and Vodka Sorbet, using nothing less than Stolichnaya to temper the exotic fruit's intrinsic sweetness.

None of the ingredients is wasted on the pretext of jazzing up the food presentation. The much-chelated carrots-and-corns won't just be a dish needs something on the side, Carlo believes that food must complement each other.

"When you create a new dish, just do it."

EFFICIENCY IS KEY AT SERENDRA

There are many reasons for people to consider having a condominium in the city. Despite the limited living space, having a place in the metro offers the convenience of having everything you need within minutes from your doorstep. But with Serendra, Ayala Land Inc. and Community Innovations Inc.'s latest and most innovative mid-rise condominium development in Bonifacio Global City, it is possible for residents to live in a condominium building and still be able to enjoy the feeling of spaciousness usually associated with homes in the suburbs. Aside from having about 65% of its 12-hectare lot area devoted to gardens and greenery, Serendra also paid particular attention to creating good spaces within the residential units.

Architect Teodoro H. Narciso of GF & Partners, the architectural firm of record of Serendra, provides an important pointer for prospective home buyers who may not know how to evaluate a floor plan or house layout. "Put furniture or have a furniture plan so that it's easier to appreciate the layout," he says.

With the furniture layout, one is able to get a better idea about the space, if it is well proportioned and therefore, more comfortable. People will be able to determine if their intended furniture will fit in their units. "Look at the doors," Narciso adds. Watch out for its proportions and how it swings to make sure that it doesn't get in the way. Consider also the location of switches and outlets. At Serendra, light switches are lower than the standard level, just about a meter from the floor, for functional and aesthetic purposes. "It does not distract if you want to hang a painting on the wall," Narciso explained.

The flow is important in considering the efficiency of a unit plan. The living and dining areas where residents entertain their guests are separated from the bedrooms by a corridor or hallway. "This provides a transition and a distinction between the public and the private space within the unit," Narciso says.

There are also areas provided in the units that encourage family interaction. In the special three-bedroom units in District I of Serendra, a TV or family room with a window was added. "For the smaller three-bedroom units, we created a study nook," Narciso explained. "It depends on the lifestyle of the buyer," Narciso remarked. "The condo's layout allows for flexible planning."

"We were able to decrease the area of the core," Narciso revealed, "which includes the hallway, the elevator, the fire stairs, and service areas. By shortening the hallway, you have a shorter distance to walk from the core to the door of your unit." They were also able to re-plan the end units so that you get three-bedroom wrap-around units in the prime areas facing the gardens so residents get more natural lighting and views of the greenery.

In a traditional plan, the kitchen exhaust is built vertically, the shaft of space extending from the units to the roof, with an exhaust fan that is powered by electricity. This can prove to be very expensive for the unit owners as the cost is added in the association dues. "At Serendra, we built the kitchen exhaust horizontally," Narciso explained. "There are notches at each level where the exhaust flows through natural ventilation."

well. This isn't brain surgery," says Anton.

A cheesecake made of the most famous of Italian bleu cheeses, the Gorgonzola, is meant as a savory dessert, not the usual sweet course associated with cakes. The intensely savory bleu cheese, in fact, is an acquired taste that this dessert is strongly recommended only for those adventurous enough.

This enthusiasm to always come up with exciting new flavors is credited to the brothers' frequent travels abroad with the family. They remember each place, in fact, by the food they ate there.

Their parents, they say, are food adventurers. "They'd say, 'we're going to eat this and if you don't like it, you're gonna go hungry,'" recalls Carlo. And so both boys learned at an early age that there's more to food than spaghetti and fried chicken.

Sunday LIFE STYLE

Missing my man

By Arlene Aran Amarante
Contributor

He smiled like an angel. Not with his lips but with his big brown eyes that lit up each time he spoke.

He could make you swoon with words that were never elaborate or flowery. He breathed life into a conversation, not because he had a lot to say but simply because he was himself. And he always left an impression without trying to.

I had a string of suitors and two boyfriends before Don, but it was only with him that I felt something different the moment we met. Across a crowded room and with 40 heads between us, our eyes caught and a connection was made. He did not dash across the room to introduce himself. He merely smiled at me with his eyes.

Don was with someone then. I, too, was attached. It would take months before Don and I would go out, finally free from any attachments. A co-manager asked us both to be godparents. He asked for my number after the reception, but I failed to give it. I had just moved to a new place that did not have a phone. He simply thought I did not want to give my number.

The next date was made on a basketball bet we made. Loser treats, winner chooses the place. To this day, I am certain we both did not care who won the basketball game. I remember Don teased me about how good Jaworski was, and I cringed each time because I did not like Toyota at all.

Don was athletic, full of life. He had been a swimmer since age 7. His parents did not spend a cent for his education because of athletic scholarships he had in various schools. He excelled in martial arts, water polo, scuba diving, golf, target shooting. The funny thing was, he sucked at the sport I played so well.

I guess that was the good thing about us. We were opposites, yet we had so much fun together. We enjoyed being clumsy and awkward and we savored our being young and immature. Oh, we had boring talks, too. I remember I actually dozed off one time while talking to him on the phone. Realizing this, he did not hang up but slept with me at the other end.

Don would one day insist to pick me up from Batangas where I had a store opening. He was particularly insistent that time, which was not like him at all. I sensed he was trying to tell me something. I thought he was about to break up with me!

He suddenly stopped his car in the middle of the Muntinlupa flyover and proposed to me right then and there. Amid the speeding cars and noisy street hawkers, I said "yes!" That was when life became sweeter for us.

Wonderful surprises

Our marriage was filled with out-of-town trips and wonderful surprises. The most memorable was a birthday I had when I told him I could not spend it with him and our son because I had a planning session in Manila Hotel. He was very disappointed. I checked in and asked him to help me get settled in my hotel room. It was when he was about to leave that I told him there was really no planning session, and that I actually booked the hotel for us. He was surprised to see my bag with his clothes and personal stuff inside. I had also pre-booked dinner at the Tennessee Walker. Don would smile at those surprises like a kid who had just been given a new toy.

It has been more than six years since I lost Don. People still feel sorry when I tell them I became a widow at 28. Sometimes I feel it has been a long time, but at other times it all seems just like a week ago.

It's not so much the birthdays or Christmases missed. It's having him around in good times and bad. It's knowing he will be there when I wake up, or before I close my eyes. It's the small, sweet fights, the way he left his clothes behind in the Hanse and Gretel, his trying to beat Imelda Marcos' shoe collection and his numerous visits to mall restrooms to ease stomach pains. Mostly, it's having conversations that only he and I understood, sometimes without any need for words.

Life has never been the same without Don. His tragic death has left me and our son Alam stronger. In the back of my mind, I always think how life would have been different if Don had not been taken away from us too soon.

But I believe he has never really left us. Don had always been that way. You felt his presence because he never really tried to make his presence felt. These days, I am sustained by the memories we once had and the one living proof of our love—Alam.

The rituals of November

By Agnes Prieto
Contributor

ON THE FEAST of All Souls, the entire nation will light candles. From the air at twilight it is a sight to behold—seas of golden, flickering flames in memorial parks and cemeteries—our tribute to the dear departed.

The lighting of candles, offering of flowers and (for some) also food are the rituals of November. Rituals are more important than we realize—they connect our inner being to outer realities.

Final destination

I will light seven candles, a pristine white one for my mother, the soul jeweler who helped design and craft my being; a blue candle for my son Xavier, blue as the vast sky representing the generosity of spirit which we will treasure forever; a candle of deep green for my brother Bunny, to symbolize the gift of creativity, his legacy to us in his poetry and song; a magenta candle for Efen, shining especially for his children who need to feel a fatherly presence and guidance in their lives; a moss green candle for Joey, its light symbolizing healing; and two candles of turquoise—for friendship and sharing—to be lit for Chito and Marlene.

Seven candles lit among bouquets of flowers—roses and mums—for celebration and remembrance.

Bus stations will be clogged with people making their way home to provinces where their loved ones are buried, where they will also light their candles and offer their flowers. Airports will be no different, teeming with people carrying special bouquets. All roads lead to everyone's final destination—the cemetery.

Memorial parks begin to fill up with people as early as two days before the feast. Tents rise. Makeshift shades are erected. Sound systems, radios and tape decks boom out rock and jazz. Barbecue grills and other cooking implements are laid out. Plastic chairs and tables are in place. Mahjong sets, cards and other games are brought in. The accommodations for the living, even as we remember our dead.

Afterlife

The rituals for the dead are embedded in our culture. We make way for the day of remembrance with no one needing to prod us. Our love for those who have passed on, our need to commemorate their lives, our hunger to not forget—all these explain why.

The function of ritual is to connect the inner (our soul) with the outer (daily reality). Ritual is necessary for our wholeness. Societies that respect the past know this fact. They protect and revere ritual.

When we light candles and offer flowers, we not only honor our departed loved ones, but also ourselves

The ritual of All Souls' and All Saints' days acknowledge our acceptance of an afterlife, another dimension beyond what we can see and touch. More importantly, these rituals symbolize our recognition that there is a part of our being that does not perish when the body dies—the soul.

We use ordinary everyday things—candles and flowers and food—to express what is not material. Candles to symbolize illumination and connection, flowers for celebration and food for sustenance.

Candles have been used in rituals since fire was discovered. In the early days they broke the bondage of darkness, and daily life continued beyond sunset because now there was candlelight. When we light a candle, we connect earthly life and beyond, acknowledging the continuation between the here and now and the forever.

Forty days after death, we keep a candle lit in our home altars to guide the soul as it traverses unfamiliar regions. It is a vigil candle to mark the transition from this plane on to the next—a recognition of engagement with spiritual forces to help our departed move on.

Raucous party

Flowers are for celebration and remembrance. Filipinos, particularly, can turn anything into a festivity. Remember Edsa I when we bypassed a bloody revolution with flower offerings by nuns and little children to soldiers armed to the teeth on top of tanks?

So we turn our remembrance of the dead into one raucous party—flowers, food, music and laughter fill the air after the prayers for the dead are said. Living it up is what we do best, and the best way to honor the dead is to celebrate our lives.

There is special food cooked for the feast of the dead. In the provinces, even the poorest huts serve rice cakes of all persuasions and varieties: Bibingka, kakanin, cassava cake, suman sa litiya, puto, catch-uta, pichi-pichi—the list is endless.

Food has a special connotation when used in ritual. One feeds the dead to symbolize that though he is gone, nurtu-

Lives enriched

In rituals such as these, our lives are enriched and enhanced as we establish that we are more than material beings with lives limited to an earthly existence.

Thomas Moore, in "Care of the Soul," points out a malaise of modern times which he calls "Psychological Modernism." More and more, he says, we are held in thrall by technology, gadgetry and automation. In the name of progress, many cultures are letting go of their connection to the spirit, giving up on ritual simply because there are no tangible, material results which can be validated by science.

This eventually starves the soul and results in psychosis, even neurosis. A manifestation of this is compulsive ritual—we find ourselves eating "junk food" again and again to satisfy that inner craving for something which we cannot quite pinpoint. Or an indulgence in "spirits" (alcohol) to provide that needed uplift. Or a shopping spree to ward off the doldrums. Or a swift spin in a gleaming new car, only to find that after the high comes the devastating emptiness.

When we light those candles and offer those flowers, we must remember that we not only honor our dearly departed loved ones but also ourselves, in the richness of our present.

KARTING champion Swatcher Matteo Guidicelli with the Lego Ferrari F1 model car of his idol Michael Schumacher.

Winning all the way through Christmas

WHEN Melnita Guiao bought a Flik Flak watch for her grandson at the Gift Gate store in Harrison Plaza, she got 50 raffle coupons, one of which was the lucky coupon that won her a Bunnysutra Swatch watch.

Since Gift Gate launched its "12 Weeks to Christmas" promo in early October, there have been 11 winners of the Swatch Bunnysutra apart from Guiao.

Anna Lyn Lumalay usually shops at Gift Gate for gifts for the special people in her life. Sometime in October, her birthday month, she bought a Swatch Irony. With that purchase, her name was included in Gift Gate's weekly draw and she won a Swatch Bunnysutra, just like Analyn Samson, who works at Phinma Properties.

Besides the watches, 11 Gift Gate shoppers have won Segue bag collections. One of them was Erlinda "Lin" Cruz, wife of actor Tirso Cruz III. This was not the first time that Lin had won in a Gift Gate raffle. She won a mobile phone in a previous Swatch raffle.

Marian Villanueva, a big Hello Kitty fan, bought a Benetton cosmetic case from the Gift Gate store in Alabang Town Center. Her name was drawn one week and she won a Sisley bag collection.

Last week's winners of Lego Ferrari racers in Metro Manila included Henrietta de Vera, Armando Tudia Jr., Yolanda Sy, Hazel Cruz, Diana Abrera, Joanna Villa and Valerie Andrade.

The provincial winners were Apple Erla Uy (Cebu), Belinda Mabojos (Tarlac) and Danielle Desires Ramos (Quezon).

Today, shoppers have a last chance to be one of nine winners of Russ stuffed toy collections.

Every purchase worth P300 at any Gift Gate, Swatch, Segue and Sanrio Surprises store entitles a shopper to 10 raffle coupons at Gift Gate during its "12 Weeks to Christmas" promo.

The prizes for the remaining weeks till Christmas include Lego Knights sets, Sanrio Desk fans, Flik Flak watches, Swatch Bijoux sets, Benetton luggage, Russ Christmas trees and Segue Minibikes. The prize for the last draw is a limited-edition Hello Kitty Vespa.

SISLEY bag winner Lin Cruz, wife of actor Tirso Cruz III.

DAVID Hasselhoff

Probation for drunk 'Knight Rider'

LOS ANGELES—US actor David Hasselhoff, known for his role on "Baywatch," was sentenced Thursday on charges of driving under the influence of alcohol.

Hasselhoff, 52, pleaded no contest to charges in a Van Nuys, California courtroom, stemming from a June 5 arrest in Encino.

The actor was also known for his role in the television series "Knight Rider."

The actor did not appear in court. Instead, his lawyer entered the plea to the charge of driving with a blood-alcohol level above .08, according to the prosecutor's office.

The judge sentenced Hasselhoff to three years' probation and revoked his driver's license for 90 days.

He must also attend an alcohol treatment program and perform 200 hours of community work.

Hasselhoff was treated for alcohol problems at the Betty Ford Center in June 2002, according to local television CBS2. AFP

Vienna Boys Choir...

Ian I wanted a dozen choirboys for private masses and concerts for the court. After the 1920s, the choir changed its uniform in favor of sailor suits, and widened its repertoire.

Today, the Vienna Boys Choir has four groups that constantly tour the world, rendering unforgettable performances wherever they go.

When the Vienna Boys Choir performs at The Peninsula Manila on Nov. 12, there will be a minimum consumable charge of P350.

The event is a project of The Peninsula Manila, the Cultural Center of the Philippines, Manila Broadcasting Co., Mont Blanc fragrances and the Philippine Charity Sweepstakes Office (PCSO) with the support of Malayan Insurance and Ralph's Wines and Spirits.

For inquiries, contact The Peninsula Manila at 887-2888 and 812-3456, extension 2205.

A Bigger World

There can be no denying that more and more people have different cellphone needs and desires, and SMART innovations aim to satisfy those individual tastes. You can choose what suits you best. SMART Gold, SMART Buddy, Talk 'N Text and Addict Mobile are now well-established brands, each with its own unique content and identity. Now, with the recent launch of SMART Infinity and Smart Kid, SMART continues to lead in providing tailor-made services that cater to every Filipino's specific needs. SMART allows you to personalize what services and products work best with you as well. You always get value for your money, depending on what your needs and desires are.

Innovator, innovations!

Others may make claims to being innovators, but we need to check the facts just to be sure. And let's clear the air once and for all.

Just the Facts, Then

SMART was the first to ever introduce the concept of an electronic wallet in your cellphone through SMART Money. SMART Load and SMART Pasaload were the first of their kind anywhere. These cheaper, more convenient loading options were a direct response to the needs of the broader market. These innovations were so groundbreaking, they were awarded at the International GSM Congress in Cannes, France.

Next came SMART Padala, the world's first (again) text-based remittance service and so accessible that the growing ranks of OFWs around the world are now using it to send funds home to their families.

Recently, SMART launched the first International Filipino SIM, 1528 SMART, in Hong Kong. In partnership with PLDT Global, PLDT's International consumer arm, and leading mobile carrier HK CSL, 1528 SMART aims to keep OFWs in touch with their families and friends back home via voice, text and other value added services that SMART is famous for.

Value-Added to You

The SMART Spirit of Innovation continues on in the matchless array of Value-Added Services (VAS) all SMART subscribers enjoy.

The now wildly popular Caller Ringback Tunes (CRBT) were first heard on SMART cellphones. Now everyone can enjoy a dose of humor and novelty: men just love Ara Mina's voice welcoming all callers. SMART StarTxt was the first service for Filipinos to text their idols and to hear their daily experiences. Who could resist hearing Diana Zubiri's coy messages or Albert Martinez's personal plans and ideas to improve Philippine cinema?

Widest Coverage

SMART has the most number of cellsites and subscribers across the nation, the largest and strongest network in the country. The words "Mas mainaw ang SMART" have virtually become part of the Filipino vernacular, especially out in the provinces. The most number of cellsites make SMART's coverage superiority more than a claim, it's a fact.

The Customer is the Heart of our Marketing Excellence

When SMART states that it is "the leader in wireless, the leader in innovations," it's more than a jingoistic line. There is a reason for SMART to innovate and it lies in every individual subscriber.

You are the reason SMART is the success it is today. You are what keeps SMART on its toes, always pushing the envelope and exploring the fringes of the wireless frontier. It is you who are the reason for our existence, and even as we thank you, we promise to work even harder and to never forget where we came from. That's SMART. Simply Amazing.

SMART CELEBRITIES, SMART BRANDS

MARTIN NIEVERA takes center stage in the newest television commercial for SMART—singing the timeless Beatles song, "All You Need Is Love". He is soon joined by a stellar cast in a huge outdoor concert, an outpouring of love from the performers as well as the concert goers. "It's easy," as one line from the song goes, for the leader in wireless, the leader in innovation.

SMART and its impressive portfolio of leading products and services gives its many subscribers—17 million and counting—plenty to love. From basic pre-paid services such as SMART BUDDY, SMART LOAD, and SMART PASALOAD, to post-paid services SMART GOLD and SMART INFINITY; from global services SMART IDD and SMART PADALA to value-added services SMART KID, SMART STARTXT, and SMART CALLER RINGTUNES.

Of course, such an exciting line-up of products and services also demands a star-studded roster of SMART ambassadors—led by Martin Nievera, Kris Aquino, Heart Evangelista, and Robin Padilla, supported by Jasmine Trias, Albert Martinez, Johnny Litton, Joyce Jimenez, Christian Bautista, and Jenny Hernandez.

Martin Nievera has always been comfortable singing, from contemporary ballads to classic hits. Such versatility and flexibility can be seen in SMART BUDDY GSM, a brand that is particularly close to his heart.

Smart Buddy GSM is the wireless business market leader in the country today, with the most subscribers in its roster, and providing the widest coverage, unmatched call quality, broadest range of value-added services, and unequalled pre-paid loading flexibility that no other digital network can give.

Friends and loved ones are some of the things Heart Evangelista can't live without. The young star has to constantly juggle and jigsaw-puzzle her acting, singing, and hosting engagements—all while never losing touch with her closest confidantes. For Heart, Smart Load and Smart PasaLoad come in very handy as she's always on the move.

Smart Load is the world's first electronic prepaid loading service that makes use of a Smart GSM cellphone to load airtime into your Smart prepaid account.

Smart PasaLoad, on the other hand, is the world's first load transfer service that allows any subscriber on the Smart network to transfer P15, P10, P5, or even P2 load amount to any Smart Buddy subscriber.

Robin Padilla has always been serious about work, flying into the country to fulfill showbiz engagements while living with his family in Australia. For him, SMART PADALA has a special meaning, as it lets him provide for his wife and four children no matter where work takes him.

SMART Padala is the world's first international cash remittance through text that allows cash remittance straight to the Smart cellphones of beneficiaries in the Philippines.

As many fans and supporters of KRIS AQUINO know, she has quite a colorful, eventful life. She's also quite the 'texter', never failing to update them through SMART STARTXT—an SMS text-based service where stars personally update fans on their busy showbiz lives.

Of course, being a mother herself, Kris takes pains to always be there for her son Joshua. This is why SMART has introduced the first cellphone service for children and their parents—SMART KID. Services like Family Finder and Kid Locator make it the essential baon for children aged five to twelve years old, while Planet Kid ups the fun and educational content.

Finishing a triumphant third in last season's American Idol, JASMINE TRIAS, dubbed the 'Filipino American Idol', has taken the country by storm. Her short visit to her homeland was full of surprises for the young singer, who now considers home to be two places—Hawaii, the Aloha state and the province of Cavite.

SMART IDD is committed to serving the needs of Filipinos to keep in touch with their loved ones abroad through reliable and affordable long distance service. With SMART IDD, our favorite American Idol and her Filipino family get to avail of an affordable calling rate of just USD 0.40 per minute.

After picking up the Best Supporting Actor award at the Manila Film Festival, actor ALBERT MARTINEZ concentrated on making this year's Film Academy Awards a red carpet affair, Oscar-style. A quick quiet round of golf, however, rounds out busy Albert, who considers SMART GOLD an important tool for his day-to-day business.

SMART Gold offers the widest network coverage and the widest selection of monthly plans with free calls and free text. Subscribers enjoy the latest handsets and many value-added services.

A star in a million indeed is CHRISTIAN BAUTISTA, who, along with JENNY HERNANDEZ, can be seen in the latest SMART commercial, singing in a park for SMART CALLER RINGTUNES. Christian, of course, is considered the Josh Groban of the Philippines, while Jenny was first seen dancing to a SMART cellphone's ringtone. With her new album "In The Mood For Love" out now, though, she can now dance to her own songs.

SMART Caller RingTones lets you express yourself to your callers even before you answer your cellphone. Customize ring back tones with the latest tunes or greetings from your favorite artists.

Oh yes, it's JOHNNY LITTON, in his requisite coat and tie, ever the perfect party host with JOYCE JIMENEZ, herself busy with her signature lingerie line—Private Joyce.

For both of them, there's nothing like SMART INFINITY to provide premium cellphone service and unparalleled service and content.

SMART provides each SMART Infinity subscriber a dedicated Infinity Account Manager, available 24 hours a day, 7 days a week. International SOS and concierge service is available around the world, alongside automatic roaming capabilities. Top of the line handsets are given free with every subscription, and are upgraded regularly.

With over 17 million subscribers enjoying the most innovations and the widest coverage, it's no wonder SMART is the most loved wireless service.

Sharing skills
Changing lives

Volunteer allowance...
Far from home...
Incredible challenges...
Return home with improved skills and wonderful memories to last you a lifetime!

VSO does not work by sending equipment, medical supplies or aid. We send skilled people. These VSO volunteers live and work at the heart of communities in Africa, Asia, the Balkans, the Caribbean and the Pacific, exchanging ideas with the local people in order to help them to help themselves.

VSO volunteers share their professional skills and experience with local communities and partners, helping them to set up and run projects that will benefit their own communities. Once these projects are up and running, local people can keep them going when the volunteers who helped to start them return home. Many VSO Returned Volunteers say they come home with improved skills in areas such as team building, problem solving, the ability to cope with difficult situations, and strategic thinking.

VSO recognizes the power of individuals driven by their commitment to make a difference wherever they are. Through VSO Bahaginan, its recruitment base in the Philippines, VSO offers a unique opportunity for Filipino professionals to share their skills with some of the world's poorest people in other developing countries.

If you're from 25 to 65 years old with at least 3 years of professional experience in Business & Management, Community & Social Development, Health, and Technical & Natural Resources, VSO Bahaginan can set you on course to one of the most rewarding experiences of your life.

Interested volunteer applicants may request for a VSO application form via email at bahaginan@vsoint.org or through postmail by writing to:

If the time is not right for you to volunteer, you can still help us build a fairer world. We also need people who are prepared to support us through donations, or by taking part in fundraising and awareness-raising activities, to help us in our work.

VSO or Voluntary Service Overseas is an international development organization that works through, and with, volunteers, sending them to more than 30 countries in the developing world. He walks tallest

By Teresa R. Tunay, OCDS

ZACCHAEUS climbing a tree in order to get a view of Jesus—it's one of the stories in the Bible that tickle my imagination. I'd picture him as a midget, an ununo—like those working as waiters at a restaurant in Manila—and I would almost inevitably be reminded of an employer I interviewed long ago who wasn't quite five feet tall but who commanded the respect not only of his employees but of the community as well.

"Wala sa taigkard lyan (It has nothing to do with height)," the diminutive boss would quip. "Success at work depends on principled leadership. The leader must have a vision and put service, not profit, as the number one goal of the organization, whether it manufactures shoes or sells tinapa." His own company, which runs a massage clinic and trains people to eventually be self-employed reflexologists, has a unique program worth emulating. After passing all his or her examinations but prior to graduation, each trainee puts in 300 hours of "charity work"—applying the newly learned skills free of charge to patients who normally can not afford to pay the cost of a massage. These patients would be either walk-ins or residents of depressed communities requesting their services. The program, thus, allows the leader to: multiply himself by passing on his knowledge; help others towards self-sufficiency; and extend pro bono therapeutic services to the poor.

His service-oriented leadership has influenced his trainees and employees to look at work through a visionary's eyes. It's easy to spot him in the workplace—he's the shortest guy around—but to the admiring eyes of his people, he's the man who walks tallest. (E-mail the author at teresa_de_manila@yahoo.com)

Gospel: Luke 19: 1-10

But Zacchaeus stood there and said to the Lord, "Behold, half of my possessions, Lord, I shall give to the poor, and if I have extorted anything from anyone I shall repay it four times over."

'Dream company'

By Bishop Precioso D. Cantillas, SDB, DD

I MET a couple who are very much engaged in a faith renewal program in the Catholic Church. They have helped spiritually many people including several poor ones whom they want to assist also with sufficient means of livelihood. They received a promise of foreign fund assistance so they are planning to put up a company, which could employ several poor people. This company would be different from others. It will provide the workers and their families a complete compensation package for a decent way of living. It will think first about the total welfare of the workers and their families and then that of profit to keep the business going. If there is a "dream team," there could also be a "dream company," and this is what I would call it—one which would pay its workers "four times over" the rest.

Will this kind of company be realistically possible? The principles of economics—where there is calculated interplay between capital, labor cost, production cost, market demand, profit and others—would indicate its high impossibility. Perhaps, only those who experience the conversion that Zacchaeus in today's Gospel encountered will be ready and willing to put up and maintain such a kind of company.

Jesus shows that a person, whether a wealthy businessman or a poor worker, who intimately encounters God's love and mercy at home or at work, will be transformed and will see things from a faith perspective rather than from an economic point of view. Everyone who greatly desires to see Jesus and experiences a deep conversion in his life will be equipped to work to make a "dream company" come true. (E-mail the author at mfv@skynet.net)

A secretary's resumé does not simply state that she can type 80 wpm and that she is extremely accurate. It is better to cite the benefits of those skills to an employer's bottom line. So, she states "Achieved top production volume by maintaining high degree of accuracy with typing speed of 80 wpm." or "Cut labor expense by about P110,000 by eliminating the need for part-time word processing staff." or "Increased sales by 15 percent in 2003 in the North Luzon region."

Under "Educational Background," start with the latest degree in reverse chronological order. Mention the name and location of the school, inclusive dates, degree earned, honors received. If you have earned graduate units, print this ahead of your college degree.

For example:

1. Graduate School of Business Administration; University of the Philippines; Diliman, Quezon City; 2002-present. Have earned 18 academic units towards an MBA degree

2. College of Arts; University of the Philippines; Diliman, Quezon City; 1988-1992; Bachelor of Arts (A B in Psychology); Cum Laude Honors; GPA of 1.48 (with 1.0 as highest grade)

3. St. Paul College of Quezon City; Aurora Blvd., Quezon

City; 1984-1988; High School Diploma, High School Valedictorian

4. St. Paul College of Quezon City; Aurora Blvd., Quezon City; 1978-1984, Elementary School Diploma; Valedictorian

Under "Training Programs Attended," print the title of the training program, starting with the latest program attended; sponsoring organization, specific dates, and place where conducted.

For example
Performance Coaching and Counseling Skills Workshop; Conducted by Career Systems, Inc.; September 6-10, 2004; Holiday Inn Manila Galleria Hotel, Ortigas Center, Mandaluyong City

Under "Professional Affiliation," print the professional and/or trade organization you are a member/an officer of, inclusive dates of membership, and address of the organization. For example

Career Development Association of the Philippines (CDAP), 2002 present; Secretariat: Assumption College, Makati City

Under "Referrals," list names of three to five people who know you professionally (in school or at work) and who can vouch for your competencies and character. You have previously asked permission from them to be listed as your reference and they have agreed.

The list of names is not included in your resumé. You simply state: Available if needed or Available upon request.

It is estimated that about 1,000 or even more resúmes are received for every vacant job position advertised. A job hunter would typically send out 100 resúmes to get one job interview. Resúmes are sent not only by the jobless but also by people who are employed and are looking for better jobs in the same career in another organization, or switching to a different career. The employer's first task is not selection but elimination. The resúmes that are eliminated and thrown out are those that look unattractive, format-wise; and those that are poorly written, content-wise.

Statistics show that it takes only 8 to 10 seconds for an employer to decide the fate of the resúmes. This is why a job hunter can send out many resúmes but is never called in for an interview. And this is also why so many thousands are still out there unemployed.

HR VP believes in treating employees like valued customers

By JR Bustamante
Contributor

EPIXTAR, an emerging player in the contact center business believes in the strength of its human capital and focuses on an innovative approach to developing and empowering its employees. The company provides a genuine "enrichment area" that occupies an entire floor dedicated to its agents' education and recreation. This area offers a brand new cafeteria, video and video game rooms—even an oxygen bar. This is all part of Epixtar's vision, as Vice President for Human Resources Joann Hizon will proudly tell you.

Hizon is pleased that Epixtar emphasizes the quality of its work environment. Understanding that the company's greatest asset, its people, is realized throughout Epixtar. For Hizon, it starts at the recruitment stage. "The interviewers of some companies make you feel indebted to them when they hire you ... parang may utang na loob ka pa. When in fact, it's the other way around. It's a matter of looking at the applicant and knowing that he or she can contribute positively. The company should be thankful to the applicant for filling the vacancy. That's how much we appreciate our people here."

Epixtar's spirit of innovation starts with the design that sets the right ambience, to our recruiting process, to how to maintain a culture of success wherein Epixtar's human capital continually learns and grows. "I want people to enjoy working here. I will walk on burning coals for them and they must reciprocate with dedication and focus."

Corporate image

As you enter Epixtar's career center, you wouldn't think it's a call center company. Epixtar's showroom with its cool futuristic design greets your senses with generation Y's new heroes like KC Montero and Sarah Meier on their computer screens. The waiting area and applicant's booth gives off a luxurious feeling comparable to five-star hotels.

Applicants who pass the company's strict screening are treated to an environment where people enjoy their work. The company believes in taking special care of both its clients and employees. "It's definitely hard work, trabahong kabayo, but I will do everything I can for you to enjoy working here. I will give you whatever you need and you will be justly compensated. I want my people to have the best opportunity for development, growth and success."

Epixtar's vision is to provide accessible amenities. "Everything is within reach here. A coffee shop at the ground floor, open 24-hours; a canteen serving the hearty meals 24/7 at U-belt prices; an enrichment lounge with billiards and computer games. There's nothing that the company wouldn't do for our dedicated employees."

Y generation

"The generation Y kids are very ambitious," observes Hizon. "These are the cell phone kids, they grew up with the Internet. They can't imagine life without computers, laptops and the convenience these things afford."

Hizon explains that majority of the call center applicants are fresh graduates who expect instant gratification unlike those employees of decades past who look for a company with good benefits, a generous retirement package where they can work until they retire. "Nowadays, the young ones have high expectations from their employer. This is not solely in terms of compensation. They search for a workplace where it is fun to work ("Where can I work with all my friends?") We understand these needs, we strive to give them what they look for."

No discrimination

Another good thing about Epixtar is its firm stance as an equal opportunities employer. "There is no age, gender, or physical bias against anyone. There is no point in prejudice at the workplace as superficial differences do not matter as long as the job gets done," points out Hizon. Epixtar is open to working students, undergraduates, housewives who need additional income, physically handicapped personnel, gender-benders or those who otherwise would not get a decent break in a conventional multinational as they are not your stereotypical workforce.

HIZON

ROGER CARPIO

Spawning of a new age

As call centers operate at odd hours, they have created a whole new market observes Hizon. Now there's a night crowd to serve, opening new business opportunities like 24-hour convenience stores, coffee shops, restaurants and laundromats. The transportation business will have to extend its operating hours to consider the midnight and early morning passengers. Who knows, the entry of this new market may even bring about unexpected positive outcomes like the reduction of traffic during the daytime. There's no denying that the industry has spawned a whole new lifestyle and industries supporting a business that never sleeps.

achievements will determine the value of your skills. Using numbers creates a vivid image of your having higher level skills and that you are worth a higher salary. Quantify your main achievements whenever possible. Cite numerical figures such as monetary budgets/funds saved; time periods/efficiency improved; lines of code written/ debugged, etc. which demonstrates progress or accomplishments due directly to your own efforts. Use bulleted sentences that begin with action verbs. Action verbs (such as saved, sold, assembled, installed, edited, restored, conducted, modeled, decreased, increased, streamlined, designed, etc.) give life to your resumes.

Example: Instead of "Maintained records for A/R and A/P Accounts," it is better to state, "Managed over 1,000 A/R and A/P accounts working directly with the Chief Financial Officer."

Can you fight harassment and live to talk about it?

DEAR Readers: I get many e-mails and faxes from people complaining about abusive bosses. You can choose to fight, I tell them, but know that harassment is a tough fight to win. It's usually easier to look for a safer boss. One woman wrote back, however, and chided me for tolerating harassment. She did fight—and she won. I encouraged her to tell her story publicly so others will know that abuse doesn't have to be tolerated. BB writes:

"I stopped sexual harassment by asking for assistance from upper management. Putting the complaint in writing was difficult. I accused a manager of harassment. I was frustrated and worried: Will they believe me? Will my personnel file be permanently red flagged? Will I become the unpopular bad guy? Will I be fired?"

The manager I was accusing is intelligent, adept, charming and well liked by others. But he was offensive to me, with constant "jokes," insults and undermining behavior. At first, these were annoying and I let them go. (I called it zapping.) Then I realized he was propelled by contempt. I asked him to stop. He wouldn't. I became anxious, defensive and whiney. I kept complaining. He kept doing it (all in fun, he said).

WORKING WOUNDED

Bob Rosner

I complained about early incidents to illustrate that he had set the foundation for an unhealthy manager/subordinate relationship way back then. He excused it by advising me he has an "off-sense-of-humor" and suggested that I "accept him." He said that I am "obsessive" and "high maintenance." He offered me company-sponsored counseling. He just didn't get it.

Sexual harassment isn't always physical. It's also verbal. I protested when this man called an associate "bitch." He replied, "I'm a manager. I can call her anything I want to." I remember thinking it was "open season." This was a new job. I didn't report him.

One day, as I began a formal presentation to department associates, the manager left the room. Later, my associates told me that as I was speaking, he slipped up behind me, stuck out his tongue, and made "monkey faces," flapping his hands over his ears. I confronted him. He denied it. I told him the associates apologized for him. He said he was "just kidding." I resented his open contempt and lost all trust for him. I still didn't want to make trouble (for him) by reporting him. (Hello?) But then he suggested I take a want ad job calling for an enthusiastic dancer for an escort service. He said, "You'd be good at this." I felt I had no other choice but to report him. I dreaded starting trouble, but I refused to quit a job I liked because of him. I submitted written details and an audiotape. I asked upper management to "get him off me." I did not lose my job. I was re-assigned to an upper management supervisor. The guy still has his job, and now he acts normal.

Here are the results from a recent workingwounded.com/ABCnews.com online ballot: If you are harassed by your boss at work would you ...

- Take it (I need the paycheck), 7.9 percent
- Leave—work isn't worth that much abuse, 18.9 percent
- Work through company channels, 34.9 percent
- Stand up to him or her 38.1 percent

My Trabaho helps jobseeker build self-confidence, land a job

By Candy G. Villanueva
Contributor

MARILEN Vista one day found herself jobless, broke and crying surrounded with expensive cars in the middle of a parking lot. She will never forget how she cried for what seemed like an eternity asking the skies why she deserved such a misfortune. The clouds never opened up to drop her dream job like manna from heaven. Her answer did not come from the sky, it came through the airwaves.

A fresh accountancy graduate from the Technological Institute of the Philippines, Vista was down on her luck desperately knocking on every prospective employer's door until My Trabaho came along. Marilen Vista is one of the beneficiaries of the "My Trabaho" program at dzRH. The AM radio program is a joint venture of the Philippine Daily Inquirer (PDI) and the Manila Broadcasting Company that aims to help the jobseekers and the working masses. As a beneficiary of the program, Vista was given training and coaching on job application and career development. As a result, she recently landed a job at the Thames International Business School as a service officer.

Selection process

"After college I've had a hard time looking for work but I never gave up because I know that there are a lot of jobs out there and I just have to look for one. So every Sunday, I bought PDI, where I learned about the program," recalls Vista. The new grad never thought that she would be chosen but gave the program a try anyway. A few weeks after, she was surprised to receive a call to attend the two-day Career Planning

My TRABAHO

Workshop conducted by Career Systems and My Trabaho.

After the workshop, 30 of the participants were whittled down to 10. Vista was happily one of the 10 who was chosen to receive career coaching sessions from a qualified career mentor. Aside from the mentoring, she further developed her confidence through a series of Career Management seminars conducted by John Clements Consultants, Inc.

Building confidence

The career management seminars taught her how to prepare an impressive resume and how to conduct herself in an interview. "I hate to be with a big crowd of people who are different from me; I'm talking about those people coming from the rich and famous that I think like to discriminate us coming from simple homes. I'm afraid of interviews," confesses the 24-year old. According to Vista, the seminar helped her in building her self-confidence. She was taught not to be intimidated by her first impressions of people. After being exposed to different personalities and environments during the program, she learned to let go of her apprehensions.

Vista is also thankful to her career mentor, Rowena Abejuela of Ancilla Enterprise Development Consulting who taught her to make the most out of her situation. "Sometimes I give up easily and get tired of being me," says Vista. Abejuela worked on Vista's insecurities by constantly reminding her to be patient. "My mentor told me to continue to dream, believe and survive," shares Vista.

"I guess I might have achieved more if I've been given the resources I needed," Vista says looking back before My Trabaho came to her life. My Trabaho tried to answer to the same clamor from the other deserving applicants of the program. Aside from the personality and attitude make over, Vista and the rest of the beneficiaries were also given physical make overs to help them in their search for their dream jobs. The beneficiaries were treated to a wardrobe update and a grooming make over that gave them the added confidence to face their interviewers. Each was also given P5,000 cash to cover job hunting expenses like transportation and preparation of application documents.

Fitting in

With her new job as a service officer for Thames International Business School, Vista handles procurements and communicates with suppliers. So far, Vista is learning the ropes and is slowly fitting in. Sometimes she feels her lack of self-confidence and her apprehension of people get in the way. "It's me, who I think doesn't really fit there. But let's see. Since I'm beginning to like the people there, maybe in time I'll change." She adds that she just tries to remember the things that the program taught her every time she feels out of place. In the end, she's just happy and grateful to have landed a job where she feels useful and responsible.

Fate and hard work

Hard work is also another thing that My Trabaho has imbibed in Vista. "I know that everyone has their own destiny. And mine is to be one of My Trabaho's beneficiaries." But more than fate, she believes that "hard work is the most important thing." Although she is most thankful to Career Systems, John Clements and PDI for helping her secure a stable job, she also believes she could not have done it without persistence and perseverance.

VISTA

Finally, she advises jobseekers that it is not enough to find a means to earn a living. "Before, my main goal was just to have a job. But from My Trabaho, I learned so many things during our seminars, one thing is you have to enjoy what you're doing." Vista has come a long way from the whining lost job hunter in the parking lot. She may be a long way off from owning one of those expensive cars in the parking area but she is most certainly on her way.

More on how to improve one's resumé

By Josie O. Santamaria

SINCE the publication of my first article on resumé writing (Sunday Inquirer, Oct. 17, 2004, Job Market p. 8), I have received requests from some readers asking me to rewrite their resúmes for them. I regret I cannot and will not do this. I provide guidelines on resumé writing and give examples of the parts of the resumé. Interested readers are encouraged to have the self-motivation to develop the skill of resumé writing by applying these guidelines and being guided by the examples given, in writing or improving their own resúmes.

In the last issue, the different parts of a typical resumé were outlined. The following parts were explained: heading, career objective, career summary, key achievements and key competencies. We will now write about the next part, which is work experience.

Under the heading "Work Experience (or Employment History)," include all work experiences full or part-time, paid or volunteer. In reverse chronological order the most recent being first, list the name, address and telephone number of the organization, duration of employment, the position you held, the position of the person you reported to, your main tasks and main achievements.

Example:

Name of company: Career Systems, Inc., a management consulting and training company; 2103 Cityland Pasong Tamo Tower, 2210 Don Chino Rocas Avenue, Makati City. Telephone: 817-0110

Duration of employment: five years (June 19, 2001 to Oct. 15, 2004)

Position Title: Accounting Supervisor

Position of the Person Reported to: Finance Manager

Main Tasks. In writing your main tasks, use the job title and skill heading that relate to and match the job vacancy you want to fill. Prioritize the information that the employer seeks. The most significant main tasks and main accomplishments need to be placed at the beginning of the section, not buried down below. Employers make snap judgments about the skills you have when reading your main tasks. They don't have the time to read through each of your job descriptions to determine if you have the skills they need.

Use power words, such as action verbs, that match the level of position you want. If you are applying for a management position, use management-oriented words as much as possible. To help you, use keywords and powerful phrases, read and analyze help wanted ads and job descriptions to get ideas. Use same keywords in your resumé when appropriate.

Example. Instead of "Accounting/ Record keeping," it is better to print "Managed A/R and A/P Accounts." Or, instead of "Give work assignment to entry-level accounting clerks," it is better to state, "Directed work/ flow, supervised and trained accounting staff performing posting to general ledger, A/R and A/P Accounts."

Under "Main Achievements," note that your major

The very funny and intensely dedicated actress conjures up success on TV's 'Marina' and 'Ang Tanging Ina.' But this theater-trained professional also understands the value of hard work, and admits that her heart still belongs to the stage

The Character as Actress

IT HAPPENS everywhere she goes now. "Uy, si Lorelei," some would gawk. "Uy, si Simang," others would point. Sometimes, small children run over with huge smiles. And you almost never hear them say her real name—but Eugene Domingo doesn't mind. She appreciates the public affection, but hasn't been changed by it at all.

"Uy, sikat ako, ganoon (Oh, I'm famous, really)," Domingo says in her trademark, aw-shucks, self-deprecating kind of humor. After almost a decade of painstakingly honing her stagecraft in plays at the University of the Philippines, the 33-year-old Domingo began her breakout with a scene-stealing turn as Simang on the ABS-CBN telenovela

"Sa Dulo ng Walang Hanggan." Now appearing regularly as Claudine Barretto's forgetful sidekick Lorelei on the fantaserye "Marina" and Ai Ai Delas Alas's wiseacre foil Rowena on the sitcom "Ang Tanging Ina," Domingo, quick of wit and fast with asides, is having fun while becoming a familiar face to millions of TV viewers.

Eugenia Roxas Domingo was born on July 23, 1971, the elder of businessman Reynaldo Domingo and homemaker Celia's two children. But it was far from a usual childhood. After a deep sigh, Domingo recalls her unusual life story in her distinctively quick mix of English, Filipino and gayspeak. "Mahabang kwento, kasi hindi naman kami normal na pamilya. Anak ako sa labas, so iba-iba yung bahay ko. Kung saan kami puwede, doon (It's a long story, because we weren't a normal family. I was born out of wedlock, so I lived in different houses. We stayed wherever we were allowed to).

Most memorable of these various dwellings was the sauna bathhouse which Domingo remembers from first grade. She enjoyed the time she spent with the maamees; she learned a lot while listening to the attendants' problems. "So at an early age, I learned about life," she says, adding that her grade school classmates thought Domingo had a big house because she lived in a building, not realizing it was a sauna bathhouse. Domingo remembers being the one tasked with calling for the next attendant on the microphone. "Number seven, please," she mimics. "At akela ko mayaman kami, kasi may second floor kaining hindi ko napupuntahan at saka lagang madilim. (And I thought we were rich, because we had a second floor that I never went to, which was always dark)."

Real-life drama

At Stella Maris College in Cubao, Domingo was drawn to performing. "Ever since I was young, whenever I see something happen, I really see it happen," she says in Filipino, adding that she developed the capacity for telling stories in vivid detail. Domingo watched a lot of TV, read Funny Komiks and was weaned by her grandmother on AM radio. "I was already aware of real-life drama and TV drama." In high school, she spent much energy as a member of the drama club, throwing herself into her extra-curricular activities.

After spending a year at the Polytechnic University of the Philippines, Domingo enrolled in Theater Arts at UP Diliman in 1989. And the next act in her story began. "It was really my dream to go there," she recalls. "It's fun at UP; it's like you're creating your own community, because it's complete with a rich culture, lots of people with different personalities, different organizations, and I really liked the freedom of artists on campus."

Her first big play was Dulaang UP's production of David Henry Hwang's "M. Butterfly," where she had a memorable entire scene spent motionless, holding a mirror to lead star Behn Cervantes' face. Domingo learned not only how to act but all the requisite skills involved with plays: washing clothes, sewing on buttons, everything. "And I liked that part," she says. "Because that's how you build respect for your profession and for other people. You don't go, 'I'm an actor, period.' You understand what your colleagues went through."

Domingo displayed an uncanny aptitude for acting, taking on all kinds of roles. For the role of a seductive maid in "Pakikiramay," a Filipino translation of Wilfredo Ma. Guerrero's "Compassion," Domingo jogged around the UP campus for two weeks to lose weight. The versatile thespian savored being on the UP stage, inhabiting comedic, dramatic and musical parts. She loved the Hermogenes Ilagan zarzuela "Sundalong Kapitan" because "it's an honor to do a classic zarzuela in Filipino." Domingo also remembers enjoying "Divinas Palabras" because it was staged in Spanish.

Playing a particularly important part was her own thesis, Harold Pinter's "Old Times," directed by Tony Mabesa, as Domingo essayed all the three roles in the play. She proudly earned her degree in 1997. "Happy siyempre para sa mga magulang ko," she explains. "My father even had the diploma xeroxed—waller size! Promise!"

Her stay in UP began to stretch as Domingo would go on leaves or stop studying for stretches as she began to make appearances on TV and film in 1991. She appeared on the pioneering children's show "Baboo," making her sitcom debut on RPN-9's "Ready Na, Direk" after being discovered by Maryo J. delos Reyes and appearing in her first soap, T.A.B.E. Inc.'s "Valiente." After appearing in Ishmael Bernal's film adaptation of Francisco Arcellana's "Divide By Two," Domingo made her first mainstream screen appearance in Jose Javier Reyes's "The Emma Salazar Case." She even went to the movie house to see herself on the big screen. "Nung nakita ko yung sarili ko sa screen, sabi ko, ang pangit ko pala talaga. Hindi talaga siya artistahan, para siyang docu. (When I saw myself on-screen, I realized how ugly I really am. I'm not made for showbiz, maybe documentaries)."

The impressive procession of directors Domingo worked with on both stage and screen would continue. Domingo was tapped by Wenn Deramas to tickle the moviegoers' collective funny bone in Star Cinema's "Ang Tanging Ina The Movie." When Deramas brought the movie to the small screen, Domingo and her alter ego Rowena came along and still goes strong, now directed by Joyce Bernal.

Comic chemistry

It was also on "Ang Tanging Ina" that Domingo first teamed up with Alai delas Alas, who can arguably be considered the poster girl for supporting players who have made it big. The pair's amazing comic chemistry, replete with adlibs and side comments galore, delighted audiences. It has also developed into a solid friendship between Domingo and Delas Alas, whom Domingo fondly calls "B.R." or best friend, something seen on the sitcom as well, real life and reel life in humorous harmony. "Click kaagad," she says.

Domingo readily admits to noticing the big difference in public recognition after her TV breakout, but she says that it's the job that matters to her. "For me, it's work, and I do it because it's expected, and I do it because I want to do it and do it right." All she wants are good projects, fun colleagues and good directors.

Aside from the obvious financial advantages, which she notes is a practical consideration, it boils down to whether or not she's enjoying herself. "Up to this day, hindi ko pa rin ma-compromise yun, kahit bayaran mo ako ng malaking-malaki, pag hindi ako nag-e-enjoy dito, lalayas ako (I still can't compromise the fact that, no matter what you pay me, if I'm not enjoying myself I'm leaving)."

It's that dedication, belied by her ram-bunctious personality, which makes her a director's dream. Andoy Ranay, who directs Domingo on "Marina," explains that Domingo "draws from her life experiences, and she's able to personify each character she plays. The way she interprets her characters makes her closer to the audience, and they take it as it is." He lauds Domingo's discipline: "It's her deeper knowledge of what she does, not just physically, but going to the heart of the character." Alex Cortez, who directed Domingo in two dramatic plays in UP adds, "She's a natural—she doesn't have to try hard at all." Domingo, Cortez explains, is a true crossover success, moving from stage to TV, and says that Domingo will readily build on this foundation. Both Ranay and Cortez appreciate Domingo's candor and wackiness.

Now reaping the harvest of years of just plugging away, Domingo likes her current place in the acting firmament. "Gusto ko talaga character roles." She doesn't envy, for example, Delas Alas's massive mainstream ascent from support to headliner. "That comes with a problem—too much pressure."

Treasured trip

So, away from the camera, Domingo treasures her free time, watching DVDs, going out of town, visiting the spa. She definitely wants more time to read her books, as she complains that all she gets to read are the beginnings, no middles or endings. "I'm done with my self-help phase, I haven't even gotten to the 'Da Vinci Code' because it's still uso," she says, adding that she's currently going through books about the behind-the-scenes work on such American shows as "Will & Grace" and "Friends." She's fascinated by all aspects of productions, after all, and is always a student of the craft of acting. She'd like to have her own family someday, but for now she spends time with her two dogs, a Golden Retriever named Shakespeare and a Shih-tzu named Praise. "Practice na yan," she says.

Work-wise, there is still stuff left to do. "I'd like to do a play, to balance things out and to have a good filmography." She'd like to do a musical again. At the moment, though she's much more in demand for TV, she'd like to do more films. What she really wants is to be another Charito Solis—not just Ina Magenta, but the late great's varied range of roles. She doesn't want to be Simang or Lorelei forever. "I'd love to have a movie that's shown every Holy Week. Something that becomes a ritual not only for Philippine cinema but for Filipino culture."

Though it would be nice to get awards, Domingo says it's reward enough when people approach her nicely in public and express how much they appreciate her work on TV. Whatever she winds up doing, she will never forget the magic of the footlights, as Domingo admits she misses the stage very much. "I can't compare kasi iba yung respeto ko sa TV and movies, but theater is really an actor's medium and it's different every night. Every performance, iba. The audience and the discipline are always different."

That same discipline is on display in any role that Domingo inhabits, regardless of medium, as it's what she believes is expected of professionals. She knows she's been blessed and lives up to it. "It's a gift from God, and you can't learn it in one night," she says. Eugene Domingo, actress for all mediums, humble servant of the thespian craft, a memorable character with a whopper of a personal story even without the necessity of a role, is enjoying herself, but never forgetting how she got here. "Discipline is normal for me," she explains. "It's something I want to share with younger actors or those older actors who may have forgotten it."

I am writing to express my indignation regarding the Pope Smith T-shirt that Rico Blanco used on the cover of SIM last October 24, 2004.

The shirt was my creation since I worked for Rico Blanco and Rivermaya as a fashion stylist for several months. I am a young designer studying at the La Salle College International, a Canadian-based fashion school located in Legaspi Village Makati. Paul Smith is one of the designers I look up to very much, thus giving me the idea to create the shirt.

I also took the photograph of Rico Blanco from the music video shoot and I have the image file, hard copy and negatives to prove it.

I'd like to request mention of this error as soon as possible since I think I am well within my rights to be credited for the use of my artwork. Thank you very much.

A New Breed of Young Entrepreneurs

A new breed of young entrepreneurs was discovered in the grounds of FEU-FERN College in Quezon City.

For the 650 college students of FEU-FERN, Organization Week is an event to look forward to. Through it, organizations are given a chance to raise the necessary funds to implement projects and activities. In this context the SMART Entrepreneurial Program (SEP) was invited to sponsor a seminar on entrepreneurship. Like the past seminars of SEP, something special was again discovered about the dreams, passion, and motivation of its participants.

With the help of the program a Business Fair was organized. Booths were constructed to provide a venue for young university students to showcase their innovative business ideas. Medz Medina is a second year student from San Beda, one of the Universities invited to take part in the fair. She came to promote Pan De Boda, which her group started as a school project early this year. The success of their product, "the Meaty Fruity Pandesal," encouraged them to take this classroom innovation seriously. Now, they are planning to open a shop along Tomas Morato to cater to the demands of their supporters. The same story is behind the success of Vel-Cro, which Daniel Ferdinand Legaspi and his group invented. After being challenged by their professor to come up with an innovative product, they thought of capitalizing on the specialty of their home city, shoemaking. For only P800 you can get yourself a pair of Vel-Cro sneakers, which is already in demand outside the Philippines.

Here we see how more and more students are lured into entrepreneurship, partly due to the lack of employment but also because of the challenge, adventure, and monetary rewards. For the graduating class of FEU-FERN, they found their way to SEP not only because of their desire to be in business. Generally, they expected the seminar to help prepare them for the future. This need was addressed with the help of established businessmen like Mr. Butch Bartolome and Ms. Melissa Umcaoco who shared their own inspiring and practical tips on starting something of your own and then working to make it a success.

The achievements of the student entrepreneurs who were part of the Business Fair proved that whatever field you chose to be in, success will be yours as long as you put in the passion and dedication. An entrepreneurial spirit can take you places no matter what your age may be.

Students Set An Example

Manny on Entrepreneurship

"Businesses do transform societies. They not only shape our physical and our virtual worlds, but also create new needs, new hopes, and new dreams."

-- Manuel V. Pangilinan, PLDT and SMART Chairman

It's not just about the innovations we bring.

It's about the opportunities we provide.

Life in Zamboanga for some college students is not so simple. To make ends meet they must work while studying. But job opportunities in the area are limited, especially for non-graduates. It has been observed that juniors and seniors in universities are eagerly looking for that extra income that will help them through school.

The SMART Entrepreneurial Program was invited to Zamboanga to give a seminar on entrepreneurship. Three prominent universities gave their support to the project that will open its doors to 200 participants. That afternoon 206 attendees registered. 75% were graduates who have not yet found jobs. They came looking for alternative opportunities that will help them earn a living and found inspiration in the words of Ms. Gracia Aduca and Mr. Roberto Valerio who expounded on starting your own business and making it work. Usually, a testimony is given by an established businessman to show the students that with the right attitude you can succeed as an entrepreneur, but on that day, it was given by two young entrepreneurs who have been working with SMART since April as student agents. This motivated the crowd even more because they realized entrepreneurship is for everybody who's willing to work hard to succeed.

SEP is currently being invited to more schools in Zamboanga in hopes of reaching more students. It has been delivering the same message since it was formally launched early this year. Opportunities are just around the corner, you must simply be willing to seize them. As entrepreneurs, we can create more opportunities for others and help our country grow.

People of the Faith

By Corazon A. Ong

An American Body, A Filipino Heart

FR. ARMAND "PETE" G. Carignan, Oblates of the Mary Immaculate (OMI), loves to say in jest that he became a priest to make up for having burned down a church in his youth.

Five of the eight Carignan boys—they were 12 in the family—were altar boys in their parish church in Dracut, Lowell, Massachusetts. On one occasion, while Armand and his brother, Robert, served as altar boys, Robert lit a candle that accidentally set the Christmas decorations afire. The flames spread quickly and soon, the whole church was on fire. This being the middle of winter, the firemen could get no water from the frozen hydrant so the church burned to the ground.

Although the boys were not punished for the accident, they got the fright of their lives. For some time, their father, Ernest, had to drive the priest to the local public school where Sunday Masses were temporarily held.

Recounts Fr. Carignan, "One of my great joys even at that age was to be in the front seat, while the priest in the back-seat held the Blessed Sacrament." Such drives, no doubt, led him on the road to priesthood.

But it would be a long and arduous path.

"We grew up during the Crash, a most difficult time—my father had $2,000 in the bank and overnight, it became $200," the Oblates priest recalls. "People had a hard time but the government also helped by giving free dinners to school children. We got day-old bread at a cheaper price. There were also food stamps and job projects for people."

Catholic school

Carignan's father was practically away the whole day working as a factory shoe-cutter, so it was left to his mother, Leona Bourque, to watch over and raise the children. "My mother was called the 'Silk Lady' in our neighborhood because she would always dress up properly and all of us children would be neatly dressed, as well," says Fr. Carignan. "My Dad wanted us to study at a public school nearby but my Mom insisted that we go to a Catholic school instead, which was quite far. In the end, she got her wish."

No doubt, his mother, who had a strong devotion to the Blessed Virgin, influenced his life's vocation. Being very close to her, Fr. Carignan found it difficult to say goodbye to her to take up his mission in the Philippines. He was, after all, only 27, and he was leaving everyone and everything dear and familiar for a place he knew nothing of. "I hugged her, gave her a big kiss and watched her walk away and disappear at the end of the hallway. She had looked at me as if to grasp my whole being and keep it forever. I was leaving for the Philippines and we knew we would not see each other for a long time."

Neither of them knew either that he would eventually call the Philippines home and earn the monicker "Katawang Kano, Pusong Pinoy (American body, Filipino heart). He would be in the country for good and became an avid Nora Aunor fan in the process.

It took Fr. Carignan 30 hours of flying time, including five refueling stops, to reach Manila on October 26, 1954. A few days later, he got his baptism of fire when he was given balut to eat with no clues as to what it was. "I spent the rest of the day trying to clear my throat of the feathers I imagined were still there," he recounts.

Other firsts

In his 50 years of missionary work in the country, there would be other firsts to come his way. He would experience his first Simbang Gabi (Midnight Mass) with "Jingle Bells" being sung in the background while he was distributing communion. He'd learn how to ride a horse without any saddle and land straight into a mud puddle. He'd learn how to drive a motorized bike in a basketball court and be humiliated in front of some 600 student-spectators as he "flipped over and went flying to the other side..."

Indeed, there were many falls and tumbles that would come his way, including a jeepney that fell into a swollen stream, but it was all worth it, Fr. Carignan says. He got to meet and befriend not only his parishioners but also the Moslems and other local tribes, like the B'laan and Tausug, whom he met when he travelled all over Mindanao, where he stayed the longest for 33 years. He had the rare privilege of saying the first Mass ever held in many far-flung areas in Mindanao.

In his autobiographical book, "Come Along—Glimpses Into The Life Journey of A Missionary in the Philippines," Fr. Carignan describes one such experience in Lampagang, one of the 30 barrios comprising the town of Tulunan in Cotabato. "Lampagang was about eight kilometers from the highway, straight into the mountains. B'laan tribes had lived there for ages, and now Christian settlers had come in, built a chapel and were requesting for a Mass. That this would be the first Mass, the first time that the Son of God would offer His life to the Father in this place since creation, was very touching to me."

Zero in on education

As part of the Oblate pioneers in Mindanao and along with the Marist Brothers, Fr. Carignan had a hand in increasing the number of schools in the area. "There used to be only one high school covering Cotabato, Gen. Santos and Kidapawan and all the students—the very good and the very bad—were all mixed together. What was needed we thought was to have one high school in every parish so we zeroed in on education," he says. At present, the Oblates have set up 110 Notre Dame high schools and 10 colleges in Cotabato and Sulu as well as two universities, one each in Marbel and Cotabato. During his stint in Mindanao, Fr. Carignan was also instrumental in setting up nine parishes with one Filipino priest each.

Fr. Carignan's first assignment in the country was as assistant priest in Banga, Cotabato where on his first Sunday, while standing outside the parish veranda, he would say, almost prophetically, "What a gigantic task lies ahead of me." He was young and full of enthusiasm so he did not really mind if the parish had no screens to ward off mosquitoes (he once caught malaria), no running water and he either had to walk or ride a horse for hours on unfamiliar and rough terrain to say Mass in the barrios.

But say Mass he did not only in the barrios of Banga but also in his next posts—Glan, M'lang, Tulunan, Libungan, Salaman, Lebak, Alamada, Kidapawan, Makilala and Carmen (all located in Cotabato)—never mind if his schedule was a backbreaking one, to say the least. He'd often say Mass in one barrio on Friday afternoon, another Mass in another barrio on Saturday morning, then on to another barrio in the afternoon and two more barrios on Sunday. On weekdays, Fr. Carignan's time was mostly spent supervising the Notre Dame high school and teaching English and Religion.

In his long years of service in Mindanao, not once did he feel he was unwelcome nor was his life threatened. "The Moslems respected our religion and I got along well with them. In fact, until now, I have some Moslem friends." But in 1973, while assigned in Lebak, he witnessed the six-month Moslem uprising against the government. It was, no doubt, a trying time for both the Christian and Moslem communities who had been living peacefully in the parish before the uprising occurred. The church building in Lebak became the temporary refuge of the Moslem women and children who evacuated there for safety.

New posts

In between his assignments in Cotabato, Fr. Carignan was also sent for three years to serve in the Visayas, mostly in Bacolod. He was glad that while in Cotabato, he was able to learn not only how to speak Tagalog but also Ilonggo and Cebuano, a skill which became handy for his new post.

In 1992, he came full circle by going back to Manila—his first stop in 1954—when he was assigned to be the parochial vicar of Our Lady of Grace Church in Caloocan City. He had initially been offered the post as director of the Missionary Association of Mary Immaculate (MAMI), whose office is located in the parish compound. "I was reluctant to take it because I had spent most of my priesthood in the mountains as a missionary and had no knowledge whatsoever about administrative work," he says.

But two years after, he finally accepted the MAMI directorship, a post he currently holds. The job involves not only prayers, novenas and administrative work but also forming close linkages with the MAMI staff and promoters—parishioners who spend time promoting parish activities and projects, among them selling all-occasion spiritual cards made by the Oblates. Proceeds from the cards finance the Oblates' missionary work here and abroad. MAMI centers are also found in Cebu, Bacolod, Iloilo, Davao, Dipolog, Cotabato, Dagupan City and Vigan, places which Fr. Carignan visits for yearly recollections and retreats among its members and promoters.

In 1995, a MAMI delegation attended the canonization of St. Eugene de Mazenod, founder of the Oblates order, in Rome and along with a few others, Fr. Carignan had a special audience with Pope John Paul II, an event which he considers one of his life's highlights.

In marking his 50th year of service in the country, Fr. Carignan has this brief message: "I thank God with all my heart for having given me the mission to be in the Philippines. As a young priest, I practically grew up among the Filipino people, whom I love. They are a part of my heart and my life and I pray for them day and night. The Philippines is now my home."

For inquiries on religious items and the all-occasion cards, you may contact the MAMI office at 364-5603, 364-8060 or 361-7636.

The Filipino Master and His Signorina

HE WAS in love, and it didn't matter that he was from the other side of the world and that her parents would have nothing to do with him.

"He was very kind," recalls Lina Paolini Lorenzo of the brown-skinned stranger she used to bump into in the stairway of this building in Rome, Italy. It was the early '30s and the 16-year-old signorina was learning to play the piano while the Filipino student, Diosdado Lorenzo, was taking up a painting course in the building.

The two would soon become a couple despite her parents' fears, and move to the Philippines just before the Second World War. After decades of being ignored for being "too modern" when the accepted painting style at that time was representational and photographic, Lorenzo in 1970 would be named a Republic Heritage Awardee for the arts, the equivalent of today's National Artist honors. When he died in 1984, his widow chose to stay in the country she has learned to call her own. Today, at 90, Signora Lorenzo still works as secretary general of the Philippine Italian Association, actively bridging the two cultures that have shaped her life.

Things did not seem as promising at the start.

Before the war, very few Italians had met a Filipino, and fewer still knew where the Philippines was. Diosdado, Lola Lina recalls, would often hoist up a map and point out the tiny archipelago when people asked. But impressions about a savage land and its people lingered. A week before she and her beau got married, recalls the signora, an Italian magazine featured a Filipino aborigine, and her friends came running to her, fearing for her future.

Disapproving parents

The second of four siblings born to an Italian coffee importer who also owned a grocery, Lina Paolini came from a conservative family. Although she completed piano in 1932 at a conservatory in Rome, she did not practice her course. "One artist in the family was enough," she thought then, the other artist being her Lorenzo. But her parents thought little of this unknown artist from a distant land and disapproved of the match.

Determined to make a life together, the couple courted the Paolini elders until they gave in. "They had to like him," Lola Lina recounts. "He was very diplomatic and spoke fluent Italian after staying in the country for six years. He also finished his art course with honors."

In 1933, they got married in Rome, and a year later, baby in tow, the Lorenzos set sail for the Philippines. It took a whole month to travel by sea at that time, and the conditions onboard were not very reassuring to the young bride. "I didn't know where I was going, but," she shrugs, "when love comes to a person..."

En route to the Philippines, the ship stopped at Ceylon (now known as Sri Lanka) where Mrs. Lorenzo moseyed around the market. "It was terrible! There were flies hovering over the caraba (panocha) and people were spitting on the ground. It was red and I thought, 'TBI'! Tuberculosis was the scourge at that time, much like AIDS today. When a man offered to help her carry her infant, the young mother refused, fearing contamination. Confiding her fears to her husband, she was relieved to be told that the red spittle came not from TB-ravaged lungs but from the betel nut that the natives chewed.

The trip was long and had several stops along the way, including one in India where the poverty was apparent. Why, the young bride wondered, did conditions seem to worsen the farther they were from Genova, Italy? "But I couldn't turn back anymore. I already had a baby," says Mrs. Lorenzo.

Arriving in Manila was a pleasant change, however. "Manila was much better then. People had a Spanish education, and the well-to-do were very educated. Men put on their coat even at home before they went to meet their guests."

But when the couple traveled to Nueva Ecija, Lorenzo's hometown, his missus again puzzled over some strange sights. Why were the natives eating wood? she thought. Later, she would learn that they were biting into sugar cane. It took her a while to adjust to the food ("It was my first time to eat catfish," she recalls), but until now, she confesses, she has yet to get used to the typhoons that visit the country frequently.

Everywhere she went, she was received royally, partly because in the '30s, a foreign bride was such a novelty. Her good looks didn't hurt, either. Being Italian helped as well during the war years. With Italy among the Axis nations, the Japanese were generally courteous and respectful, recalls the signora, although they did have to evacuate to the countryside and bury their jewelry and Diosdado's paintings to escape the invaders' covetous eye. Towards the end of the war, she recounts, their group had mistakenly entered a forbidden zone in Isabela. The Japanese soldiers rounded them up, lined them in a row and slapped them one by one. After being slapped by a soldier, the young Mrs. Lorenzo cursed him back in Italian and surprisingly, got away with it. "I was very lucky," she admits now.

New idioms

Such luck did not hold out when it came to her husband's painting career, however. "He was one of the first moderns along with Victor Edades, Galo Ocampo and Botong Francisco," says Sandro Villaraza, of his grandfather. But in the '20s and '30s, people were enamored with the photographic realism and idyllic style of such artists as Fernando Amorsolo, and thought little about the modernists who wanted to develop new idioms to express themselves.

Disgusted with the local market ("My husband said he would never paint to please the people," says Signora Lorenzo) the artist tried his luck in Hongkong in 1935 where he established the Accademia di Belle Arti. His wife followed a year later but had to rush back to her children because of a cholera epidemic. Diosdado Lorenzo soldiered on for another year in the British colony before coming home.

Over the years, Lorenzo's art slowly gained acceptance, especially when he and several of his colleagues established the Thirteen Moderns, composed of himself, Victor Edades, Botong Francisco, Galo Ocampo, Vicente Manansala, Hernando Ocampo, Cesar Legaspi, Demetrio Diego, Bonifacio Cristobal, Jose Pardo, Arsenio Capili, Ricarte Purugganan and Anita Magsaysay-Ho. Lorenzo's paintings soon found their way to the National Museum, the Metropolitan Museum, the Cultural Center of the Philippines and in private art collections. The artist died in 1984. He was 78.

His widow, who has learned to speak Tagalog like a native, still nurtures the Italian in her. The Secretary General of the Philippine-Italian Association for the past 42 years has recently been knighted by the Italian government for having done more than her share to popularize the Italian way. The Philippine-Italian Association organizes events to showcase Italian food, music and culture (this year's Notta Italiana is scheduled on Nov. 17), offers language courses, translates documents in Italian, lends out Italian costumes, and works to strengthen the ties that bind the two countries. The Pigafetta monument in Cebu and Juan Luna's statue at the entrance of Intramuros were both donated by the Association to the Philippine government.

Sunday lunch

With 12 grandchildren and 15 great grandchildren, Lola Lina Lorenzo looks to Sunday lunch at her home in Sta. Mesa Heights to savor the memories of having raised a Fil-Italian family. Looking back at her full life, she decides that her happiest memory was when she and her late husband visited Italy in 1976 to go back to the small chapel where they were wed. Afterwards, one of her sisters (all her siblings have since died), surprised them with a celebration at the same restaurant where they originally held their wedding reception.

Her saddest memory, she confides, was the death of her fourth child, Mario, who was only 17 then. "He was a very bright student but he had kidney failure and there were yet no dialysis machines at that time." Her other grown-up children are: Emilio, a general surgeon, Enrico, who's into business; Mariella, who owns a travel agency; and Paolo who has a construction firm.

But otherwise, says Lola Lina, she has no regrets. And no unfulfilled dreams either. "When you're 90, you live for the day because you don't know what tomorrow brings. You enjoy the moment."

Cebu's Spokesman of Reggae

Rude boy - noun; (In Jamaica) a lawless urban youth who likes ska or reggae music
The New Oxford Dictionary of English

WATCH out, Yoyoy Villame.

There's a new kid in town, and his name is Budoy. And if all goes right, Budoy and his band, Jr. Kilat, just might be Cebu's next big export, after dried mangoes and danggit.

Huh?

I was just as flabbergasted as anyone else to learn that Cebu had a huge, homegrown reggae music scene.

"Even the street kids sing Bob Marley songs," reported Tropical Depression's Dominic "Papadom" Gamboa, long-time promoter of all things reggae, fresh from a concert tour of Cebu to promote "Island Riddims," a CD compilation of local reggae bands. Significantly, three of them are from Cebu, and two from Cebuano-speaking Dumaguete.

"The jeepneys are painted in the Jamaican tricolor," he adds. "And you can buy tams from street vendors." (Tams are the colorful knit bonnets that Jamaican rastas wear to keep their dreadlocks in check.)

Island music

More significantly, there are weekly reggae programs on Cebu radio stations, and reggae concerts are huge events drawing upwards of 20 bands and audiences numbering in the thousands. For the past 10 years, Bob Marley's death anniversary has been observed in Cebu with a massive open-air concert that usually lasts until dawn the next day.

What gives?

Like Jamaica, Cebu is an island with its own insular culture, and it could be that one island's culture is more palatable to another.

"In the Camotes Islands, there is a guitar style called kinablit, which has a Caribbean feel," says Budoy, Errol Maraviles in real life, who is in Manila to sign Jr. Kilat's record deal with Galaxy Records.

That's right, Budoy will soon be going nationwide. With his crooked "Cat in the Hat" hat, his Urusei Yatsura print shirt and baggy shorts, Budoy cuts a surreal figure, but he's also steeped in esoteric Visayan culture, like that tidbit about kinablit, which makes him the ideal spokesman for the Cebu reggae scene. In fact, Budoy is something of a cult figure among his home-bais.

Apart from his performances with Jr. Kilat (which means kidlat or lightning), he also hosts a weekly TV show on RCTV, a Metro Cebu cable station, called "Small Time," in which he interviews people running small businesses in Cebu. His Manila analogue would be someone like "Strangebrew's" Tado, straddling sub- and mainstream cultures.

Jr. Kilat also stands apart from the rest of the Cebu reggae bands, many of which are simply cover bands doing the usual Bob Marley numbers. Aside from doing all-original material in Budoy's idiosyncratic Cebuano, which incorporates slang, coinages and a smattering of his native Waray tongue, Jr. Kilat also bases its sound on dub, rather than straight reggae.

What, pray tell, is dub? Gather round, kids, and I'll tell ye.

Reggae, of course, is Jamaica's musical style blending native Caribbean forms and American rhythm and blues. Its most characteristic feature is the eccentric accent on the afterbeat, rather than the downbeat as is usual in Western pop music: Boom-CHIKA-boom-CHIKA-boom, you get it.

In the late '60s and early '70s, Jamaican record producers would take a song, strip off the vocals, in effect making a minus-one, add echo, reverb, and other studio trickery, and release the result as a "dub" plate or a "version." With its subsonic bass, ghostly echoes, and occasional disembodied voices drifting in and out of the mix, dub soon became a genre all its own, appealing specially to aficionados freshly baked on ganja.

Rude bair Budoy ponders his next move

Reggae is hot in Cebu, and this band's version sounds like a cross between Jamaica's Lee 'Scratch' Perry and Yoyoy Villame

Soon, club DJs discovered that they could add their own live, improvised vocals over the dub track. This was called "toasting," a practice which made its way to the US and evolved into rap. The dub producer's bag of studio tricks was also instrumental in the evolution of techno, and all subsequent electronic dance music.

Dub poetry

In the late '70s, a transplanted Jamaican poet and activist based in England named Linton Kwesi Johnson created what he called "dub poetry," releasing several albums of his harangues against the oppressive racist system set to dub.

Which brings us back to Budoy.

"I started in the early '90s with my band Raw Belief, which was the first reggae band in Cebu," he says. "Nawala ang reggae, tapos bumalik. (Reggae disappeared then made a comeback). Maybe because of the work of Jah People Society, the group that organized the first Bob Marley Day concert."

Reggae fans in Cebu eventually organized themselves into Harambe, a loose collective.

"Harambe is a Swahili word meaning 'working together,' pagtambayong in Cebuano, like the bayanihan," explains Budoy. "Every year, we observe Bob Marley Day and Rasta Claus, our annual Christmas concert where people pay for tickets with donations of rice or old clothes or anything that we can distribute to the urban poor."

After Raw Belief, which had a few Cebuano songs, Budoy formed another band called Urbal, with primarily English lyrics. And then he discovered Linton Kwesi Johnson's dub poetry, paving the way for Jr. Kilat and Cebuano dub.

"I was shocked to find that the reggae scene in Cebu has grown so big," he says in Filipino. "People flock to watch reggae bands and gigs, ordinary people."

He was as shocked, he adds, to find that people in Manila like Jr. Kilat even if the lyrics of their songs are in Cebuano. But, he observes, "Reggae has a more mass appeal in Cebu. Masa ang crowd. Dito, sosyal. So the scene in Cebu's kinda different. There are more people watching and anybody can come."

Jr. Kilat's music has been described as "Lee Scratch Perry meets Yoyoy Villame." Perry is one of the best-known dub producers in Jamaica, and Yoyoy is, of course, along with Max Surban, the reigning king of Cebuano pop and originator of the novelty single.

"I also listen to Yoyoy," says Budoy. "Of course, he is already part of our culture. I've met him," he adds, with a small measure of pride. "He listened to our songs and he liked them."

Signature song

Jr. Kilat's signature number is titled "Original Sigbin," which means original Visayan, says Budoy. "Jr. Kilat is Jr. Kilat because of our Visayan lyrics, not necessarily Cebuano, because I sometimes use Waray."

In fact, Budoy traces his roots to Laoang, Northern Samar. One of his grade school teachers introduced him to the Waray traditions of luwa and siday. These are forms of improvised folk poetry performed during fiestas. As in the Tagalog halagasan (poetry joust), a theme is chosen and the contestants improvise spoken or sung lyrics on the theme, much like the rap battles in "8 Mile," with the most eloquent and the witest winning the contest.

Given this background, Cebuano dub isn't that much of a stretch after all. "Of course, my lyrics are different because my environment is urban," says Budoy.

One song, "Hala Suyop," describes local shabu addicts who resort to selling off their household goods, including the LPG tank, for a fix. "They think they're being cool, but they're the victims," says Budoy. Unfortunately, this anti-drug song was widely misinterpreted and was actually banned in Dumaguete and Davao.

Banned in Dumaguete! Now there's an auspicious beginning for a band.

Another song, "Katyubang," describes the effects of the katyubang, which is Cebuano for talampanyay or angel's trumpet, a wildflower with wildly hallucinogenic effects.

Another song, "Lantsiao Gumadkaw," is puzzling even for Cebuanos, until they learn that lantsiao is Chinese for "penis," which is that part of a bull that goes into the reputed aphrodisiac "Soup No. 5." In the song, Budoy speculates what would happen if the source of "Soup No. 5" had the "Mad Cow" disease.

And so on. At present, Jr. Kilat is an eight-piece band with a full-time trombone player and a turntablist, and sounds like no other band in the country. Non-Cebuanos will soon be getting a taste of Jr. Kilat with the upcoming release of their first album, a live concert recording, by Galaxy Records. Since dub is primarily a studio form, a studio recording is also in the works.

The Artist Abroad

By Luis H. Francia

No More Years!

Why is the Philippines one of only three countries in the world who'd rather keep George Bush than have John Kerry? Is it because Filipinos don't see the disastrous results of Dubya's reign of terror?

NEW YORK—In a poll of 35 countries taken last July and August by GlobeScan research organization, only citizens of Poland, Nigeria, and the Philippines favored George W. Bush over John F. Kerry. India and Thailand were evenly divided, but the rest of the countries went for Kerry by more than a two-to-one margin: 46 percent to 20 percent. In Italy and Great Britain, whose leaders have backed Bush's war on Iraq, people preferred Kerry 58 percent to 14 percent and 47 percent to 16 percent, respectively. You could say Kerry passes the global test. But not where Filipinos are concerned: They would rather keep Bush (57 percent) than have Kerry (32 percent). The poll's premise must surely be that since the world's sole superpower has such an impact on the world, the views of its citizens matter though, alas, they carry no electoral weight in the U.S.

Why do we constitute one of only three countries whose citizens would, if they could, vote for Bush? Is it because most Filipinos don't see firsthand the disastrous results of Dubya's reign of error? In four critical areas alone, his administration has made a fine mess of things: 1) Iraq: The justifications for the war proved to be false, rendering the casualties there senseless; American occupation of Iraq has instead become a magnet for jihadists. 2) The economy: The huge budget surplus achieved by the Clinton administration has turned into a whopping deficit. Total government debt stands at $7.4 trillion. Obsessed with tax cuts for the wealthy (whom he famously calls "my base"), Bush is the first American president since Herbert Hoover to wind up his term with fewer jobs than when he began. 3) The environment: Environmental regulations have been weakened; air quality alone has gotten worse while research on alternative fuels is minimal, with former industry officials now the foxes guarding the coop at the Environmental Protection Agency. Additionally, the Bush administration has withdrawn from the Kyoto Protocol, treating global warming as a theory, a disturbing sign of its divorce from reality. 4) Civil liberties: Constitutional rights have come under unprecedented assault from a government wrapped in Nixonian suspicion of dissent—highly ironic, given that the Bush administration has cast the Iraq folly as a template for democratic change—and whose legal minds have justified the use of torture on alleged terrorists.

Maybe the same reasons that Filipinos voted overwhelmingly for former President Estrada are at play here: folksy affability, a seemingly benign paternalism, and machismo; I am afraid the Bush-leaning Filipinos mirror a similar sentiment among Filipino voters in the U.S., more so perhaps among the older generation than their offspring. Why however would a good number of Filipino immigrants go for an administration that hurts their interests and has betrayed the middle- and working classes? As an example of Bush's wrong-headed policies, I noted in an earlier column how more Filipinos have been deported under this administration than any other one that I can recall.

Of course, a significant segment of the Filipinos here have their roots in military service—armed forces personnel usually vote Republican. And then there's 9/11 and the ensuing culture of fear, continually stoked by the Bush administration, whose boy keeps crying wolf (and-Rummy-and-Dick-and-Condol)—fear stoked by terror alerts that seem never to be backed up by on-the-ground intelligence. And fear, arising out of the visceral, preempts rational thinking, which leads in turn to a shoot-first-ask-questions-later policy, Iraq being Prime Exhibit A. Fear trumps other factors as well, whether the state of the economy or the sagacity and veracity of a leadership, whose blind arrogance allows no admission of mistakes. Fear is exactly why the Bush administration keeps tying Iraq to Al-Qaeda, even when its own intelligence services have debunked this notion decisively, and why it has portrayed Kerry as a leader unable to make America safe, in the process shamelessly maligning his patriotism and turning his bravery during the Vietnam War into a liability. Avoiding the sunlight of reality, Bush and his posse live in a narrow, make-believe world, resembling the character in Alice in Wonderland who insists a word mean what he wants it to mean.

Another factor as to why many Filipino immigrants will go for Bush: The persistence of the colonial hangover that is, to paraphrase that famous quote, part Hollywood, part convent education. The iconic American immortalized on the silver screen (and now laughed at elsewhere) is still revered by a great number of Pinoy: the lonesome cowboy whose vocabulary may be limited (is in fact expected to be limited) but whose charm and heart are both expansive and generous and who dispenses justice with a few, well-chosen bullets. The ending always has him, by now a mythical figure, riding into the sunset, glorious in victory.

But perhaps the most frightening aspect of a second Bush term will be the continuing erosion of the line separating church from state. A Christian with literal views of the Bible (he believes the jury is still out on evolution), Bush presents himself as someone chosen by God for a mission. If you believe you're acting on God's behalf, how can you go wrong? How can anyone question your acts? Isn't this what the Taliban profess as well (they're still in Afghanistan, in case you didn't know)? Isn't this what fundamentalists of all stripes (Christian, Muslim, Jewish) live by? What Osama Bin Laden—still on the loose—believes?

Any type of evangelical government disturbs me. But an evangelical government that, in addition, cares little for human rights, the environment, for the disadvantaged, that views war as a divine instrument; an administration that, for all its religiosity, has a heart of darkness and is led by a man who doesn't read, disdains facts, and eschews moral complexities—this kind of government terrifies me. Two days from now I'll cast my vote for Kerry, who may not be the ideal replacement for Bush but he's a great deal better than the dogma-afflicted, linguistically challenged missionary-in-residence.
